More than 20 years ago the American Federation of Labor, anticipating future trouble over the growing problem of prison products entering into competition with the labor of free men and the investment of free capital, petitioned Congress for legislation tending to stop the traffic in convict-made goods.

The problem presented to Congress in the early consideration of the question was what form this legislation should take. It was agreed that the authority of Congress extended to the regulation of interstate commerce, but it was likewise manifest that there were grave constitutional questions involved in the attempt of Congress to interfere with this interstate commerce to the extent of a prohibition.

Meanwhile, several of the States, including New York and Massachusetts, had endeavored to enact State laws subjecting convict-made goods, regardless of their origin, to certain State regulations or prohibitions.

All such attempts were declared by the courts to be beyond the power of an individual State, as the goods arriving from a prison in another State were, in fact, in interstate commerce and, therefore, beyond the regulatory powers of the individual States.

Each State had a right to enact its own laws in respect to its own prison products. The enactment of such laws, however, removed the products of a State's prisons from the markets of that State but could not interfere with the entrance of prison products from other States into its own open markets.

FACTORS UNITE ON BILL

Congress at various times considered the legislative proposals tending to cure this situation, but for many years such proposals failed in one branch or another or were prevented from passing by circumstances entirely foreign to the consideration of the bill itself, such as legislative confusion and congestion.

In 1928, however, the American Federation of Labor had introduced what has become known as the Hawes-Cooper bill, which the signers of this letter sponsored respectively in the House and Senate.

During the Seventieth Congress other influential elements in our American life joined in support of this measure.

The General Federation of Women's Clubs, acting in the interest of the prisoner himself and to protect women wage earners from the competition of prison products, actively joined in the support of national legislation.

Certain manufacturing interests throughout the country likewise enlisted their efforts on behalf of the measure to protect private capital from the increasing inroads being made by convict labor concentrated in a few fields of activity.

A number of organizations interested solely in scientific, modern penal management and the rehabilitation of the prisoner also assisted.

Exhaustive hearings were held by both the House and Senate committees, on which sat the representatives of more than 22 States.

Labor officials, manufacturers, and representatives of the General Federation of Women's Clubs and prison organizations were heard at length. Prison officials, opposing the Federal enactment on the theory that it would tend to destroy prison industries, were heard also. Prison contractors were likewise given consideration.

As a result of these hearings the bill was reported favorably in both the House and Senate and subsequently passed both bodies by an overwhelming majority. The measure was then sent to the President, who requested a review of the proposal by the Attorney General and, having received a favorable reply, President Coolidge signed the measure on January 19, 1929.

FEDERAL ATTITUDE SUSTAINED

But the enactment of this bill by the representatives of 48 States in Congress was not the first indication of the Federal attitude toward competition between convict labor and free labor and capital.

There has long been on the Federal statutes a prohibition against the importation of convict-made goods into the United States to compete with the products of free labor and private capital.

In the tariff bill in 1930 Congress threw additional safeguards around that provision of the law relating to the importation of convict-made goods and extended this law to products made by indentured or forced labor.

The executive branch of the Government, through the Treasury Department, has very recently evidenced its intention of strictly enforcing this national ban on imported convict-made goods.

Likewise Congress many years ago, legislating as to the conduct of Federal penitentiaries, provided that no goods, wares, or merchandise manufactured in the Federal penitentiaries could be sold upon the open markets. The products of more than 8,000 Federal prisoners are to-day limited as to sale by the Government itself, such products being manufactured only for Government use.

THE HAWES-COOPER BILL

The language of the Hawes-Cooper bill is definite. It reads as follows:

"Be it enacted, etc., That all goods, wares, and merchandise manufactured, produced, or mined, wholly or in part by convicts or prisoners, except convicts or prisoners on parole or probation, or in any penal and/or reformatory institutions, except commodities manufactured in Federal penal and correctional institutions for use by the Federal Government, transported into any State or Territory of the United States and remaining therein for use, consumption, sale, or storage, shall upon arrival and delivery in such State or Territory be subject to the operation and effect of the laws of such State or Territory to the same extent and in the same manner as though such goods, wares, and merchandise had been manufactured, produced, or mined in such State or Territory, and shall not be exempt therefrom by reason of being introduced in the original package or otherwise.

"SEC. 2. This act shall take effect five years after the date of its approval."

This act in itself does not stop the sale of convict-made goods.

It does not provide that convict-made goods may not be shipped from one State to another or from the prison of one State to a resident of another State.

It simply provides that when convict-made products are shipped from one State into another State such products, upon arrival and delivery in the second State, shall be subject to the laws of the second State.

If the second State has no law regulating the sale or distribution of convict-made goods, then the convict-made goods of the first State may be sold or distributed in the second State without interference.

The real difference between the situation as it exists and the situation as it will exist after the Hawes-Cooper bill goes into effect on January 19, 1934, may be more pointedly illustrated as follows:

At the present time New York State does not permit the products of its prisoners to be sold on the markets of New York or shipped out of the State of New York for sale or delivery. The products of New York prisons may be sold only to State institutions in New York State and may not be sold upon the open market.

But at the present time products made in the penitentiaries of Indiana and Missouri may be shipped into the State of New York and may be sold and distributed in New York. In fact, they are so sold and distributed in New York.

But the Legislature of New York enacted, under the authority of the Hawes-Cooper bill, a new statute which will, in effect, after January 19, 1934, subject all prison products entering New York from Missouri or Indiana prisons to the same laws which regulate prison products manufactured in New York.

Therefore, after January 19, 1934, under provision of a New York law enacted under the authority of the Hawes-Cooper bill, Indiana and Missouri prison products will not be sold in New York State, except in violation of the law of New York State, and anyone may be prosecuted under the New York State law for selling prison products.

From the above it will be manifest that the Hawes-Cooper bill itself neither bars convict-made goods from transportation, nor does it, of itself, operate on convict-made goods in the absence of a State enactment made under it.

Should any State desire to avail itself of the benefits permitted under the Hawes-Cooper bill it will be necessary for that State to enact its own convict labor laws.

Furthermore, if any State desires to protect itself from becoming the dumping ground for prison products of other States, it must enact its own regulations through its own legislature.

STATE ACTION FORMERLY FORBIDDEN

Under section 8 of the Constitution of the United States, Congress is given authority "to regulate commerce with foreign nations and among the several States and with the Indian tribes." This power was granted to the Federal Government by the States, and the courts have held that no State legislation may interfere with the exercise of this authority which the States have given to the Federal Government.

In 1890, however, Congress passed what was known as the Wilson Act, which provided that intoxicating liquors transported into any State and remaining in that State for use, consumption, sale, or storage, upon arrival in that State would be subject to the operation and effect of the laws of that State enacted in the exercise of its police powers.

By that act Congress removed from intoxicating liquors the character of interstate commerce when the particular goods upon which Congress legislated arrived in a given State for sale or distribution.

The constitutionality of that act was tested in the case of Wilkerson v. Rahrer (140 U. S. 545).

The Supreme Court held that this act on the part of Congress was not an attempt to delegate the power to regulate commerce. It held that this was not a grant of power not already possessed by the States. It held that this was not an attempt on the part of Congress to adopt State laws.

The court said:

"Congress has taken its own course and made its own regulation, applying to these subjects of interstate commerce one common rule whose uniformity is not affected by variation in State laws in dealing with such property."

The court held that in removing the interstate commerce character from the particular commodities legislated upon Congress was exercising its authority to regulate commerce. The court held that if Congress chooses to remove the interstate commerce character from designated subjects of interstate commerce before that character would ordinarily terminate, such act is within the competency of Congress.

A most significant statement was made in the decision of the court in that case when it said:

"The framers of the Constitution never intended that the legislative power of a nation should find itself incapable of disposing of a subject matter specifically committed to its charge."

The court further said that Congress had, in exercising its authority to regulate commerce, simply removed an impediment to the enforcement of State laws in respect to imported packages in their original condition.

This letter is not a brief upon the constitutionality of the Hawes-Cooper Act, but so much of the Rahrer opinion has been cited as may tend to indicate the character of the Hawes-Cooper bill in its relation to the State.

The States, without a specific utterance on the part of Congress, would have no power to interfere with interstate commerce in convict-made goods; but under a specific utterance by Congress removing the interstate commerce character of prison products upon their arrival in a State, which the Supreme Court has held is within the competency of Congress to do, each State under the Hawes-Cooper bill has the authority to regulate such products within its State borders.

It may be well to indicate here that the action of Congress in passing the enabling act, known as the Hawes-Cooper bill, was based upon the opinion of the court as to the authority of Congress in this regard.

PRISON PROBLEM IS A STATE PROBLEM

Congress was not unmindful when passing the Hawes-Cooper Act of the problems which might arise in the respective States as the result of subsequent State legislation enacted under authority of the Federal act. In fact, the 5-year-extension period granted in the act is an indication that Congress realized it would take some time for States to readjust their prison affairs to meet possible State enactments.

But, in the opinion of Congress, the menace of competition from convict-made goods was paramount, and Congress refused to permit the Federal Government, by its silence as to convict-made goods, to stand as an impediment to the enforcement of State laws.

Under the old system, one State could ship its products into another State in defiance of the latter's State laws, and it could do so simply because Congress had failed to act and, therefore, permitted interstate commerce regulations to become an impediment.

One State was in a position to enforce its views on the balance of the States. It could force its convict-made products into the markets of a sister State and thumb its nose at the laws of that State.

The evident absurdity of such a condition is brought out by the fact that one State by its own legislative body attempted to regulate the sale of its own prison products within its borders but permitted those same prison products to enter an adjoining State in defiance of the laws of the adjoining State.

Congress had the assurance of those who indorsed the Hawes-Cooper bill, while it was pending in Congress, that continued efforts would be made by them to assist the States in the working out of prison problems, and it may be said that the authors of this bill at the present time are aware of the continued activity of the American Federation of Labor, the General Federation of Women's Clubs, manufacturers, and prison organizations in assisting in the working out of the State legislation.

What particular form that State legislation shall take is not within the dictate of Congress. There have been many and varied proposals. Indeed, a variety of solutions is almost inevitable in view of the fact that each State has its own particular prison problem, and no plan can be suggested that will operate alike on all States.

Congress issued no mandate to the States. It has not ordered any State to enact any new legislation, nor does the Hawes-Cooper bill repeal any State legislation. The State itself must determine on the basis of its own problem what it may do to prevent its markets from becoming the dumping ground for prison products of other States.

MANY PLANS DISCUSSED

Some States have already enacted legislation looking to the diversification of prison products so as not to concentrate prison labor in the manufacture of a few products, the sale of which would be harmful to private industries. Some of the States limit their own prison products to their own State institutions and are now enacting legislation prohibiting both their own and other prison products from sale on the open market.

The "State use" system is the term most generally applied to the system by which prison products are consumed by State institutions. Where the consumption of prison products in a given State is confined to State institutions, however, such a law will not prevent convict-made goods being dumped into that State, unless there is a specific regulation as to sale and distribution applying equally to all such products, regardless of their origin.

Able authorities have pointed out the value of diversifying prison industries, so that no one product of prison manufacture will be turned out in sufficient quantity to interfere with private labor or private capital. Scientific systems of standardization have been studied and proposed for the purpose of facilitating the exchange of prison products with the institutions of the State. The parole system and other remedial suggestions for cutting prison population are being studied. Employment of prisoners in certain fields where their labor will not seriously compete with free labor or private capital has also been widely studied and discussed.

All of these records are available to legislators and State executives who desire to readjust their prison industries on the basis of the new theory. This is a State problem with which each State is confronted and the seriousness of which grows with the prison population.

The Hawes-Cooper bill has laid the foundation by which the prison contractors may be permanently put out of business. How quickly this new situation will be brought about rests entirely with the States and in the enlightened manner in which they handle their own particular State problems. The Hawes-Cooper bill enforces nothing upon the States. It enables them to act if they so desire. It does not of itself solve the prison-labor problem. The intention of Congress was to permit the States to solve this problem and to remove the Federal impediment to the enforcement of State laws. The enactment of constructive legislation looking to the removal of convict-made goods from competition with free men and free capital rests with the legislatures.

Whether any State is to become the dumping ground for prison products and the enrichment of a prison contractor or agency now rests solely with the State legislatures.

Very sincerely yours,

JOHN G. COOPER,
Representative from Ohio.
HARRY B. HAWES,
Senator from Missouri.

DUTY ON PETROLEUM

Mr. HORR. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by including therein a statement made by me before the Ways and Means Committee on the oil tariff situation.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HORR. Mr. Speaker, may I take this opportunity of calling to the attention of this body the importance of imposing a duty upon foreign petroleum and its products?

Every phase of the general welfare of the Nation is involved in the proposed tariff on petroleum and its refined products. It offers a solution of a large portion of our unemployment problem. It involves the restoration of lost markets for our manufactures. It will restore vanished sources of revenue. It will relieve both public and private charity of unbearable burdens. It will provide new opportunities for American enterprise. It will halt the growth of a menacing monopoly. It will lift from our political life baneful influences whose end no one can see. It will rehabilitate our merchant marine. It will be better than a subsidy for distressed farmers. It will solve many of the problems faced by railroads now forced to consider wage cuts because of diminished freight tonnage. It will relieve banks and other financial institutions now carrying frozen assets. It should mark the turn of the tide of prosperity. Without being a panacea for all the many ailments now disturbing the body politic, it will make possible the solution of a larger number of those problems than any system, policy, or scheme which has been put forward.

There are approximately 22,000,000 persons living in the oil States west of the Mississippi. Their well-being is bound up in the oil industry, even if they are not directly concerned with it themselves. These 22,000,000 people constitute one of the most important markets for American goods. Their purchasing power has been so decreased by the ruin of the American petroleum industry that factories in the industrial States have been forced to close or curtail operations. This has added still more to the unemployment. Railroads have felt this drop in consumption of American goods and have been forced to lay off employees and consider sweeping wage cuts. Every portion of our national industrial life has been harmed by the prostration of the American petroleum industry.

No statistician has compiled the price paid by the American people for permitting foreign oil to devastate our markets. The total cost must be far up in the billions of dollars. This is practically equivalent to granting a subsidy in this sum to a few great oil-importing corporations. These oil importers are the only ones who have profited by our failure to impose the tariff. That profit has enabled one group of these firms, the Standard group, to pay dividends which have steadily increased during the past five years from a little over $200,000,000 a year to $286,000,000 in the last reported year. Some of the subsidiaries of the oil importers, such as pipe-line companies, have paid dividends up to 400 per cent per year. If this is not profiteering, then there is no profiteering. Meanwhile American labor, the American farmer, the American railroader, the American shipowner and sailor, the American manufacturer, and the American consumer have all suffered.

If the destruction of the American producer had profited the ultimate consumer, there might be some slight justification for admitting their foreign oil duty free. Actually, however, the price of the refined products of petroleum has not been affected. That price is arbitrarily determined by the great oil importers who dominate the distribution, as well as the refining of petroleum in this country. A study which was made of some 50 cities throughout the country showed that gasoline was selling at unusually high rates when the crude oil from which it was produced was selling at an abnormally low price, while at other times gasoline was selling at bargain prices and the crude oil from which it had been produced had sold at almost record-high rates. Meanwhile, the price of lubricating oil has remained constant at 25 to 30 cents a quart, even when the crude oil from which it was made was selling at 10 cents per barrel of 42 gallons.

This liquid wealth, so readily available, and for which so great a market exists within our own borders, can remove the current depression whenever Congress gives the word by the passage of a proper tariff. At a time when countries and cities are verging upon bankruptcy and when the economic life of the whole world is in disorder, it is neither good statesmanship nor good business for us to prevent the development of a great American industry and utilization of almost fabulous wealth. The wealth and political influence of those who are selfishly profiting through the prostration of the American petroleum industry should not prevent us from considering the welfare of American labor, the American farmer, American business in general, and the stability and solvency of the financial institutions of the country.

The State of Washington has great potential possibilities in oil production. In many parts of the State indications have been found and in some instances actual oil has been encountered in drilling. We of the State of Washington are of the opinion that in order that this infant industry may be developed, an encouragement through tariff is necessary. Particularly is the State of Washington interested in the importation of foreign fuel oils as these oils are in direct competition to the coal industry of the State. Large deposits of coal are undeveloped and mines are not running to their capacity because of this competition. In our opinion this tariff on oil would stabilize the market, protect our infant industry, and will be the means of development of whatever oil products we have in the State.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted to:

Mr. WOLVERTON, for three days, on account of attending funeral of the late Hon. Percy Quin.

Mr. GRIFFIN (at the request of Mr. BOYLAN), for to-day, on account of illness.

That being true, I move that the House do now adjourn.

SENATE

THURSDAY, FEBRUARY 11, 1932

(Legislative day of Friday, February 5, 1932)

The Senate met at 12 o'clock meridian, on the expiration of the recess.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senate will receive a message from the House of Representatives.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE

A message from the House of Representatives by Mr. Chaffee, one of its clerks, announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. 7716) to amend the radio act of 1927, approved February 23, 1927, as amended (U. S. C., Supp. V, title 47, ch. 4), and for other purposes, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

THE PROHIBITION QUESTION

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President, I desire to insert in the RECORD, by unanimous consent, a radio address by Mrs. Jesse W. Nicholson, of Maryland, at a banquet of the Daughters of the American Constitution at Louisville, Ky., in December, 1931.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The address is as follows:

The question we must consider to-day is, Shall we surrender to a rich "wet" group of outlaws and nullifiers?

The Association Against the Prohibition Amendment and its auxiliary, the Woman's Prohibition Reform Organization, are asking the support of good citizens on the basis of their deep concern for the welfare of society, to restore respect for law, and especially because of their distress about our young people.

How long have the liquor interests which these groups represent been the saviors of society?

How long have they been concerned about respect for law?

How long have they been solicitous about our young people?

While prohibition enforcement has not been perfect it is certainly not to be compared to the evils that flowed out of the legalized liquor traffic. For how many here to-night remember when the brewers had the stranglehold? How they raised their corruption funds? How they organized their following? How they manipulated labor? How they boycotted big business? How they overrode the law? How they degraded politics? How they worked the press? And how they now seek to break down the Constitution?

Besides the seven millionaires, who are contributors to the Association Against the Prohibition Amendment, the brewers and distillers are its strongest supporters, according to the testimony brought out at the judiciary hearing in Washington.

Why do you suppose these brewers and distillers are making contributions to these wet organizations?

If any citizen here to-night imagines this old crowd of brewers and distillers, wholesalers and retailers are dead, or have given up the fight, you need but to inform yourself.

Oh, yes; they are claiming a very large membership, but that is for public consumption. What did the sworn testimony disclose at the judiciary hearing? They had exactly 400 members in Maryland—my own State, their national headquarters—and 10,000 members all over the entire country. Yet they have spent over a million dollars in their propaganda and have the audacity to ask for another million to carry on their program of nullification and sedition.

Take away the big salaries of the officers in these wet associations, and all this high-pressure compaign they are conducting will fall flat. It's the big money back of their movement and not the people, for this country is dry.

If there is any doubt about this country being dry, let any political party again name a wet candidate and the constitutional women of this country will give them such a beating as they never dreamed of, and 1928 will not be a circumstance.

What remedy have they in this machine age with airplanes and automobiles if you bring back liquor and take away our safeguard?

The United States district attorney's office subpœnaed the speaker to discuss the charges she made against the Association Against the Prohibition Amendment for the violation of the corrupt practice act, in which they received a $5,000 gift they failed to report to Congress as testified by one of their shining lights, Capt. William Stayton, who admitted under oath the evasion in making their report.

With them the end justifies the means—if they played the hypocrite in not reporting a $5,000 gift, we do not know how much more they have received they have failed to report.

The assistant district attorney admitted to me the accuracy of the record, declaring his office was without authority to act because of the statute of limitation.

The Walker Whiskey Co. of Ontario, Canada, a foreign company, has made large contributions to the Association Against the Prohibition Amendment through their Michigan office.

The Du Ponts have made large contributions to the Association Against the Prohibition Amendment, one of the Du Ponts declaring under oath that one of his corporations would save $10,000,000 in income taxes if they could get the eighteenth amendment repealed and a tax on beer.

The Seventy-second Congress has already been deluged with letters from the Woman's Prohibition Reform Organization, an auxiliary of the Association Against the Prohibition Amendment, which have financed their activities, asking for repeal of the eighteenth amendment.

Opponents of prohibition among women do not ring true in statements regarding their sudden discovery of the awful menace to youth through alcohol and their inconsistent demand that therefore it should be restored to a legal status, for alcohol is just as dangerous served legally as illegally. They talk and act as though they thought bootlegging was something new, when as a matter of fact, when the liquor traffic was at the highest stage, we had speak-easies, blind pigs, blind tigers, doggeries, joints, dives, crooked drug stores, vicious resorts, murder mills, and the like operating without the law. When did the liquor traffic ever obey any law?

When we had the licensed saloon and they were supposed to close their places of business at midnight—they used to turn the clocks back to evade the law.

They say they do not want the saloon back; but if you bring back liquor in any form; who is going to dispense it?

Let us not deceive ourselves or lull ourselves to sleep with a feeling of security, for we must fight to hold what we have gained. We must not forget the "wets" were against the going of the saloon and they are not adverse to its return, and one of their witnesses so declared before the Judiciary hearing in Washington.

This liquor woman's organization, which sails under a false name of reform organization in order to give them a semblance of respectability, are besieging Members of Congress for resubmission of the eighteenth amendment.

But we say no resubmission until the wets give us a better plan. You could never get 36 States necessary to vote for repeal. Therefore all resubmission could do, would be to delay enforcement and make for lawlessness.

It is indeed unfortunate but certainly enlightening to see the great press of New York and the voices of bankers sidetracking the people's mind from meeting this world calamity of depression of which they are partly to blame, by turning them back to how they can get a drink of beer. The people of this country do not want beer; they want bread.

The real backbone of the opposition to the enforcement of prohibition is found with men and women in the higher walks of life, and these the arm of the law must reach.

Already the political leaders have their eyes on 1932. The party that takes a wet stand in 1932 is doomed to disruption.

I regret to have to apologize for the Democratic leader in my own party, Chairman Raskob, who was recruited from the Republican Party to "help rid the country of the damnable affliction of prohibition," and who has made large contributions to the wet association to obtain that result, but has accomplished little but bring dissension and strife in our party, which will not cease until he quits as head of the party leadership.

Mr. Raskob since 1928 has been horribly sensitive about being called a Republican. Once in a public outburst he attempteed to prove that the only time he had bolted the Democratic Party was on the free-silver issue in 1898 when he was just 15 years of age.

The Democrats may just as well realize the truth now, that before the American people will entrust the reins of power to their party it must divorce itself from the wet element that seems to completely dominate the party in the East, and which promises to be active in sponsoring a group of "wet" candidates for the presidential nomination in 1932.

The party leaders say the tariff and water power are to be the issues in 1932, but I tell you that prohibition is to be the one paramount issue in 1932, and the women who make up organizations like the one I am addressing here this evening can be depended on to keep it the supreme issue.

We do not intend to allow the politicians to divert our minds about sticking to a party label, for we care nothing for a party label, if it does not represent principle.

We constitutional women are not deceived by all this wet propaganda, for prohibition can be enforced. It is being enforced, and the constitutional men and women of America must stand guard to see that it is enforced better and better each year.

We women will think first of our children and we will not compromise our principles on any plea of party regularity, because we have worked too long for prohibition.

We remember there are graves in which martyrs to the cause of law enforcement lie. We remember how our forefathers faced the contempt of thousands, the hostility of the influential, the suspicion of friends, but in season and out they gave their all to make our country a better place to live in.

They dreamed of a day when the children of our fair land would be born into a country where liquor and its curse were not known. They dreamed of a day when the workingman would no longer be robbed of his earnings by an aristocracy of brewers and distillers.

They prayed for the day when their women would be liberated from the fear and awfulness of drink-soaked husbands and drink-wrecked children.

To bring this dream to pass they toiled incessantly and poured out their money and talent, and many of them died in the fight, killed by their incessant fighting.

They have passed on the torch to other hands, and their dying cry is still ringing in our ears. Carry on. Carry on, and we must not surrender or fail them.

PROPOSED REDUCTION OF GRAZING FEES IN NATIONAL FORESTS

Mr. THOMAS of Idaho. Mr. President, I present letters from Mr. James Farmer, of Boise; of Mr. F. S. Gedney, president of the Bruneau Sheep Co., of Mountain Home, both in the State of Idaho, and also a statement by the National Wool Marketing Corporation, of Boston, Mass., relative to the proposed reduction of grazing fees in the national forests, which I ask may be printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

There being no objection, the letters and statement were referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

BOISE, IDAHO, February 5, 1932.

Hon. Senator JOHN THOMAS,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR THOMAS: I understand that you have introduced a resolution in the Senate asking for a 50 per cent reduction in grazing fees. I wish to assure you that as a grower this is one of the most needed pieces of legislation that could be rendered for sheep and cattle growers and other grazers on our national forests.

Our valuations on sheep since 1929 have dropped from $12 and $14 per head down to from $2.50 to $3 a head. In fact, there are very few sales and those that have been made have brought even less than the above figures.

For the past two years our operations have shown losses ranging from $1.50 a head to as high as $3 a head, with the result that our equity is being completely wiped out. Our only hope being that our production costs can be lowered during the next two years, which may permit our returns coming nearer to offsetting our expenses.

Again thanking you for your keen interest and assuring you I know that these small reductions piled on top of each other are going to be the salvation of our industry, I remain,

Sincerely yours,

JAMES FARMER.

MOUNTAIN HOME, IDAHO, January 29, 1932.

Senator JOHN R. THOMAS,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR THOMAS: We wish to add our bit to assist you in passing your bill to reduce grazing fees on the national forests. We certainly need the help of such a reduction and feel that we are entitled to it.

When the forests were first created I was practicing law at Elko, Nev., and drew the petitions under which the first forests in that State were created. At that time we were told that the Government would never charge more for permits than the cost of administration. For some years the charge was less than the cost of administration. Later the forest officers conceived the idea of making money out of the forests. In other words, of making these forests a money-making proposition.

This was a new departure in our Government, as never before had the United States Government sought to make money out of any of its public resources. Before that time our Government had only sought to help its citizens, not to make money out of them. This idea was wrong and is wrong in principle. It should have never been adopted by our Government. There is no place in our Government for such a principle.

The livestock business is now in such a condition that we are sorely in need of help all along the line in reducing our expenses, and other agencies and governments are helping, why not the forests? As an illustration, this State has reduced the valuation on sheep from $6 to $2.60 for taxation purposes.

We run about an average of 18,000 sheep, lamb on the range, and run our sheep out most of the year. Our operating cost is small in comparison with other outfits; also our receipts are not as large per head as other outfits. We keep our ewe lambs each year; therefore, of the above, only about 12,500 are breeding ewes. I make this statement that you may better understand the following figures which, I think, may help you in your work.

The following are our receipts for the last three years for wool and lambs sold, and practically the same amount of wool and the same number of lambs sold each year:

Receipts from wool	$36,881.61	$29,005.68	$19,971.90
Receipts from lamb sales	36,034.97	25,202.22	[1] 22,445.92
Value of ewe lambs	27,463.81	21,847.68	----------
	100,380.39	76,055.58	42,417.82
Expenses	86,543.40	110,822.97	70,930.00

[1] Including ewe lambs.

The above would show the loss, but in each one of these years we sold some ewes, so our profit or loss as shown by our books is as follows:

Profit, 1929	$2,492.22
Loss, 1931	19,721.50

The ewes we sold these two last years were sold on time (which we did in order to dispose of them), and it is very doubtful how much we will finally get for them, which may materially add to our loss.

I have given you the above figures particularly for the purpose of showing how our receipts have decreased for practically the same amount of wool sold and same number of lambs. For instance, you see that our wool in 1929 brought $20,000 more than in 1931.

Our lambs in 1929 brought three times as much as the lambs in 1931. The wool brought half as much. This shows that we are getting from one-half to one-third as much as in 1929.

Here is another thing that tells the tale: On July 1, 1929, the company did not owe anything. On December 31, 1931, the company owed $94,852.87, and all this has been used to pay running expenses.

I trust that this may be of some help to you. If so, and there is anything further I can do to help, please call on me.

Thanking you for your endeavors in our behalf, I remain,

Very truly,

F. S. GEDNEY,
President Bruneau Sheep Co.

STATEMENT OF NATIONAL WOOL MARKETING CORPORATION, BOSTON, MASS.

If the Government is seriously interested in alleviating problems faced by agriculture, it could make an important contribution toward that end by readjustment of fees stockmen must pay to use national forest ranges, according to J. Byron Wilson, McKinley, Wyo., general manager of the National Wool Marketing Corporation, with headquarters at Boston.

Spokesman for 35,000 western woolgrowers in their efforts to obtain lower grazing rates, Wilson is one of the leaders of the fight now being waged at Washington with the Forest Service, branch of the Department of Agriculture. Rates remain the same as when livestock commodity prices were more than twice their present levels. All efforts to obtain aid have been met by "cold indifference," Wilson declared.

"Senators JOHN THOMAS, of Idaho, and ROBERT CAREY, of Wyoming, are leading the stockmen's battle at Washington with a joint congressional measure which will instruct the Secretary of Agriculture to reduce grazing fees for 1932 and 1933 at one-half the level for 1930," Wilson said. "Those two Senators are alert to the dire straits in which the livestock industry finds itself, and they are worthy of much praise for their uncompromising stand in their efforts to win justice for stockmen now facing the most trying time in the history of this industry which is so vital to western prosperity.

"It is difficult for the stockman to conceive of anyone more deserving of assistance in any rehabilitation program. We have the moratorium for foreign countries which owe us billions. We have the Reconstruction Finance Corporation providing $2,000,000,000 for industry and business. Yet the Department of Agriculture, with cold indifference and a certain smugness, refuses to come to the aid of the almost bankrupt livestock man and an industry which is a keystone to the existence and prosperity of the West.

"Almost alone at Washington, Senators THOMAS and CAREY are waging their fight to get this relief, but other western Senators have promised aid, and plenty of pressure will be brought to bear when the test comes. Sheepmen have always found a willing friend and counsellor in JOHN THOMAS, an Idaho sheepman and farmer. He championed our causes for years before becoming a public servant and now is more aggressive than ever in carrying the banner of all agricultural interests. The same is true of Senator CAREY, a veteran cattleman and native of Wyoming."

Wilson said congressional action would be necessary to obtain reductions in grazing fees, since repeated appeals for aid had been "too casually" rejected. While the resolution is intended for relief of stockmen in their home States, Senators THOMAS and CAREY are aware that similar conditions exist in the West. The sheepman's spokesman pointed to the many hardships now being endured by sheepmen as evidence of immediate needs for reduction of grazing fees.

"Stockmen are now going through one of the most serious winters in years and in many districts of the West the 1931 drought reduced feed supplies to low levels," he continued. "Bitter weather has placed a premium on available food. Short rations also carry the threat of weak spots in fleeces, which may further depress revenue.

"For three years sheepmen have been losing money. The heavy losses sustained in 1930 and 1931 will more than wipe out profits for several years back. Losses have been $3.41 for the past two years. Figures for 1931 will fall close to the severe losses of 1930. Profits in 1932 are extremely doubtful.

"Grazing fees are fixed—and apparently beyond control. All other expenses of sheep operations have been conscientiously reduced by sheepmen. Now there is every justification to expect reductions for privileges of Federal grazing. Western sheepmen openly resent such iron-handed control of the very land they are the only users of.

"The present national forest grazing-fee scale was established in 1927 to run through to 1934. When it was fixed fine strictly combing wool was selling in Boston at $1.08 to $1.12 per pound, the average for the year being $1.10. Lambs at Chicago were bringing $13.13 to $16.84 per hundred, the average for 1927 being $14.99. During 1931, in contrast, fine strictly combing wool in Boston averaged only about one-half and lamb prices at Chicago less than one-half of the 1927 prices; yet national forest grazing fees remained the same.

"The last annual report of the Chief Forester of the United States Forest Service, for the fiscal year 1930–31, showed that $1,960,642 was derived in fees for use of national forest forage. Grazing receipts on national forest ranges increased over the previous year by $17,728, yet stock owners saw incomes dwindle by millions during the same time. In 1931, the report shows, 6,848 sheepmen and goatmen used national forests, their bands totaling more than 6,500,000 head. Cattle and horse permittees totaled 19,969, covering 1,338,000 head of stock.

"Through its Washington office, the National Wool Marketing Corporation has been working for more than a year to try and obtain a just downward revision of national forest grazing fees. We have had many conferences with Government authorities on the subject, but so far our efforts have been met with indifference and slight plays of sympathy, devoid of action. These officials have made no effort to be of service to the growers. With two champions like Senators THOMAS and CAREY, growers feel that readjustments will come soon, and justly."

REMONETIZATION OF SILVER

Mr. WHEELER submitted an article entitled "Silver Can Cure the Crisis," by J. F. Darling, one of the directors of the Midland Bank, England, from the London Daily Mail of December 9, 1931, which was referred to the Committee on Finance and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the London Daily Mail December 9, 1931]

SILVER CAN CURE THE CRISIS

By J. F. Darling, one of the directors of the Midland Bank, England

It is doubtful whether the nations of the world have thoroughly apprehended the unparalleled nature of the present crisis, otherwise definite steps would have been taken ere now to cure it.

Not only am I confident that it can be cured, but that it is within the power of our National Government to effect a remedy by a very simple act which could be passed before the session ends. But, first of all, let us endeavor to find the real nature of the trouble.

The crux of the crisis, which has so disturbed the equilibrium of the world, is the catastrophic slump in world values of commodities and securities. In consequence, profits are being turned into losses on such a scale that there is an unparalleled volume of unemployment throughout the world. Not only Britain's budget but well nigh all budgets have been thrown out of balance and taxation has become insupportable. In a slump so unprecedented potential buyers are afraid to buy and potential lenders afraid to lend.

LACK OF SECURITY

The crisis goes far beyond anything that the mere provision of added credit facilities can cure. The effective working of the credit system presupposes adequate security against which accommodation can be granted. The credit machine, however, is now compelled to run dead slow, not through lack of power—witness the tremendous credit power inherent in the gold holdings of the United States and France—but through lack of security.

Even at the absurdly low quotations now reached how much of anything could be sold? Commodities, bonds, shares, real estate—can they be realized to any appreciable extent anywhere in the world? Our immediate pressing concern, therefore, is with the restoration of values, which must precede the effective use of credit and world recovery.

It is urged that reparations, war debts, tariffs, and the hold-up of gold by the United States and France are blocking the way. And it has been suggested that these questions should all be considered together at a comprehensive international conference.

I am very much afraid if we have to wait for such a conference to effect a cure for the world crisis general bankruptcy, through sheer inability to liquidate debts, may be ahead of us. It is, indeed, not so very far off. To call such a conference before raising values is putting the cart before the horse.

Now, to bring about a restoration of world values some dynamic price-raising power is needed, a force, moreover, which would raise values without increasing debts. Whence is this dynamic force to come? It is ready to hand, provided by nature.

GOLD AND SILVER

Nature has provided the world with two metals eminently suitable for use as money, and from the dawn of history both have been so used. Nature has also indicated their relative values, for she has yielded, on an average, no more than 14 ounces of silver for each ounce of gold, and the yield at the present time is somewhat less. For many centuries the value of silver was approximately 15 to 1 of gold. Yet gold has now been accorded a value which is about seventy times that of silver.

Because the world has become steeped in a gold mentality it has persistently refused to recognize a simple solution of many of the grave economic problems that confront us. It is to go back to nature's provision and again use both silver and gold as money, imparting to them a value not far removed from what may be termed their natural value.

First of all, we must restore equilibrium in the value of the money of the world if we are to have equilibrium in trade or exchange of commodities, which is the principal function of money.

BRITAIN CAN DO IT

How is this to be done? There is no time for an international conference. Nor would it be likely to achieve success. The official policy of the United States and France is to act as a unit in upholding the gold standard. Nor is this surprising, seeing that they hold the greater part of the world's gold.

Britain, however, through her relationship with India, which is the largest silver-using country in the world, is in a position to restore the value of silver unaided. It can be done in the simplest way by authorizing the Bank of England to hold rupees, or their silver content, in the metallic reserves against Bank of England notes at a value equal to the exchange value of 1s. 6d. per rupee.

The relationship between the pound and the rupee is already very close, for last summer the Prime Minister, in effect, gave Britain's guarantee to maintain the value of the rupee at 1s. 6d. But the silver value of the rupee is now only 7d. It used to be 2s. before the Indian mints were closed to the free coinage of silver in 1893. India had then an honest rupee with its intrinsic value equal to its exchange value. India should be given this again.

Were Britain to be called upon to implement her guaranty it would be under conditions equally ruinous to both Britain and India. But were Britain to anticipate her guaranty and boldly declare to the world that India's mints would be reopened to the unrestricted coinage of rupees, and that these rupees, or their silver content, would be received by the Bank of England—in other words, would become part of the metallic basis for the money of Britain—she would not only do much to restore tranquillity in India but could save the world from imminent economic and social disaster.

If this were done forthwith the value to be imparted to silver, even should sterling ultimately rise to the old gold parity, would be approximately one-twentieth that of gold, which would still be well within its production or natural value. The sterling price of silver would be raised from 19d. to 48d. per standard ounce and definitely stabilized at that. The gold price would be raised from about 30 United States cents to about 70 cents per fine ounce, on the present gold value of sterling, and would rise as sterling rose. So recently as the beginning of 1926 the gold price of silver was also about 70 cents.

ENHANCED BUYING POWER

What now would be the effect upon the world? Not merely would the silver-mine owners be enriched and the basis for credit enlarged, with an effect upon world purchasing power analogous to vast new discoveries of gold; but the value of the great mass of silver already in existence in the world, held in India, China, and elsewhere, would be substantially enhanced, and with it the well-being of perhaps the greater part of the population of the globe who hold that silver.

Now this could not take place on the scale that is here contemplated without reacting on the world values of all commodities and securities. The restorative effect on all values would be immediate and world-wide, enabling buying and selling, borrowing and lending to resume their normal course, and business to become profitable once again. Further, this result would be achieved without adding to the already onerous burden of world indebtedness, which, as a consequence of the rise in commodity prices, would be greatly lightened.

In the remonetization of silver, therefore, we have readily available a dynamic power provided by nature capable of restoring world values, which is a condition precedent to world recovery. So far as I can see under existing conditions, there is no other power capable of doing so.

THE WORLD COURT

Mr. WAGNER presented resolutions adopted by the Bar Association of Nassau County, N. Y., relative to the World Court, which were referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Whereas the President of the United States on the 10th of December, 1930, sent to the Senate for ratification a protocol of adherence to the World Court, which protocol accepts the reservations theretofore adopted by the Senate; and

Whereas this protocol has been adhered to by 55 nations and the court has now been functioning with dignity and success in the adjudication and decision of international questions of high importance for more than 10 years; and

Whereas American participation in the court has been urged by our four last Presidents in conformity with long-established American policy, now finally embodied in the Briand-Kellogg peace pact, and the court has been firmly established as an essential of international order and a source of international law; and

Whereas in the present seriously disturbed conditions prevailing throughout the world the influence of the United States should be exerted in cooperation with the nations in the maintenance of this great judicial institution for the legal and pacific settlement of international controversies: Be it therefore

Resolved, That the Bar Association of Nassau County, in the State of New York, affirm its belief in the necessity for the prompt adherence of the United States to the Permanent Court of International Justice and most earnestly urge upon the Senate of the United States the prompt ratification of the protocol submitted by the President to that end in order that the United States may at the earliest possible date signify its adherence to the Permanent Court of International Justice;

Further resolved, That the Secretary of this association be requested to communicate copy of this resolution, through the proper channels, to the Senate of the United States.

JANUARY 29, 1932.

THE PROHIBITION QUESTION

Mr. WAGNER presented resolutions adopted by the advisory council of the New York State division of the Women's Organization for National Prohibition Reform, together with an article entitled "Prohibition and the Economic Crisis," which, with the accompanying article, were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Whereas the Governor of the State of New York has urged the passage of tax legislation during the present legislative session to meet a large deficit to cover the cost of government;

Whereas before national prohibition revenue from taxes on alcoholic beverages helped to meet the cost of government in New York State; while now, under prohibition, this revenue supports an outlaw industry and its resulting bootleggers and racketeers; and

Whereas in New York State both the Republican and Democratic Party platforms carry planks for repeal of the eighteenth amendment: Therefore be it

Resolved by the advisory council of the New York State Division of the Women's Organization for National Prohibition Reform, in conference assembled in New York City on this day, February 8, 1932, That we urge the favorable consideration by our Representatives in Congress of a change in the prohibition law, which shall restore to New York State its sovereign right to determine a system of control of the manufacture, sale, and transportation of alcoholic beverages within its own borders, the revenue from which would reduce the State deficit and furnish appropriations for general welfare; be it further

Resolved, That a copy of this resolution be sent to all New York State Representatives in Congress assembled and that a copy be sent to the Hon. Franklin D. Roosevelt, Governor of New York State, and members of the legislature.

PROHIBITION AND THE ECONOMIC CRISIS

(Issued by the New York State Division of the Women's Organization for National Prohibition Reform, New York City)

THE ECONOMIC ASPECTS

Believing that the eighteenth amendment and the Volstead Act have had a large part in the economic distress which exists to-day, Mrs. John S. Sheppard, New York State chairman of the Women's Organization for National Prohibition Reform, has obtained the opinions of the leading economists of New York State.

In making public the views of the economists Mrs. Sheppard said:

"The year 1932 finds the State of New York and the Nation at large still faced with the pressing problems of 1931 and 1930. Unemployment continues to be a challenge to the citizens of the State of New York and thousands of families still have no prospect of support except from public charity.

"Therefore for several months past we have been consulting with economists, obtaining their opinions along these lines. Realizing as we do the disastrous effect which the eighteenth amendment has had in undermining the social and moral welfare of the people, we know that on this account alone repeal is absolutely necessary, but we feel, too, that in this trying time the economic angle is one which should be seriously considered in order to plan for future economic stability in the State and Nation.

Dry arguments refuted

"One of the chief points in our studies has been to establish the fallacy of the old-time arguments of the drys, that our economic prosperity of 1919 and of 1924 to 1929 resulted from the eighteenth amendment. A majority of the economists we have consulted have given their deliberate opinion that prohibition was not a material factor in causing the former prosperous times.

"We are confirmed in our determination to work for straight repeal of the prohibition act, rather than for legislation permitting light wines and beers, by the opinions of the economists who make it clear that they consider that the legalization of light wines and beers would be less effective than repeal in stimulating business and bringing about recovery from depression.

"We feel, too, that under modification the demand for hard liquor will still continue and, therefore, speak-easies and bootlegging will continue, as will the corruption which is an inevitable consequence of this illicit liquor traffic. Nor will mere modification of the prohibition law have any appreciable effect on the economic situation, because it will not relieve us of our burden of heavy taxes, due to the great outlay for attempted enforcement and the loss of revenue from taxes on liquor sold. This revenue will continue to enrich our criminal class, as it does to-day, and as it has in every country which has tried prohibition."

OPINIONS OF ECONOMISTS

Lewis H. Haney, professor of economics, New York University:

In announcing the results of a questionnaire on The Economics of Prohibition sent out to the economists of New York State, Doctor Haney made known two outstanding facts:

1. The economists believe that such repeal would increase the revenue of the State and the Nation and tend to relieve the taxpayer.

2. A majority believe that it would have the effect of a new industry and serve as a stimulus to business by increasing employment and benefiting agriculture and the railways.

Doctor Haney analyzed the situation as follows:

"The prevailing opinion is that employment would be moderately increased as a result of the repeal of the prohibition laws. It is believed, however, that there would not be much effect on the money income (or wages) of individual laborers.

"There is a clear-cut majority opinion that the revenues of the Government, both State and Federal, would be increased. It is believed that the taxes of the individual citizen are heavier than they would have been but for prohibition, and it may, therefore, be inferred that without prohibition taxpayers would have had more money to spend.

Labor's efficiency not increased

"There appears to be no adequate evidence that prohibition has had any material effect on the efficiency of labor.

"While the losses which are connected with drunkenness and enforcement of liquor laws are not believed to be closely measurable, it is the majority opinion that such losses would be less under a condition of unrestricted manufacture of alcoholic beverages, without the saloon system, than they would be under the present condition.

"The prevailing opinion is that the effect of straight prohibition repeal in stimulating employment, business activity, and Government revenue would be greater than the effect of merely legalizing light wines and beers.

"The attempt to enforce prohibition has proved to be costly and wasteful. It has put a large volume of business outside of competition, regulation, or taxation. It deprives the Government of revenue.

"Under present conditions the question is not one of liquor versus no liquor, but one of unregulated liquor traffic versus regulated liquor traffic."

Edwin R. A. Seligman, former professor political economy, Columbia University:

"Repeal of the eighteenth amendment and restoration of the Government tax on liquor would yield a return of $1,500,000,000 yearly and would permit abolition of the present personal-income tax together with a substantial reduction of State and local taxes.

"In the year 1918 the State of New York received from its liquor tax $21,000,000 and the local licenses amounted to $16,000,000 or $17,000,000, nearly $40,000,000. In proportion, when growth of population and welfare are considered, this would mean, if we had the State tax to-day, a net income of $100,000,000 to $125,000,000." (Reprint from New York Times, January 19, 1932.)

Michael T. Florinsky, Columbia University:

"It seems clear to me that the eighteenth amendment results in direct losses to the Treasury.

"1. Loss of the revenue derived by all countries from the legitimate taxation of the manufacture and sale of liquor.

"2. Loss in income tax through the inability of the Federal and State Governments to reach the revenues of the very large number of people who derive their incomes from the illicit trade in liquor; the very nature of such income necessitates evasion.

"3. Expenditure on the enforcement of the eighteenth amendment imposes upon the Treasury a heavy burden which, as far as I can judge by the conditions I have observed in New York, is not justified by the results."

A. W. Zelomek, statistician-economist:

"Our present national deficit could easily be reduced and, at the same time, it would not be necessary for the increased taxation which has been requested by the present administration. A large revenue would be derived from legalizing the sale of light wines and beer under proper Government control."

M. C. Rorty, economist:

"On the whole, any sound economic arguments for the repeal of the eighteenth amendment must be based on the assumption that repeal would—

"1. Reduce the total direct and indirect cost of drinking; or

"2. Divert revenues to governmental purposes that now accrue to bootleggers and force the latter to turn to genuinely productive occupations."

Virgil Jordan, economist:

"The economic significance would be twofold:

"First. It would make possible a considerable increase in Federal Government revenue; and

"Second. It would probably have a temporarily stimulating effect on popular psychology and business sentiment. I feel that the social, moral, and governmental aspects of the question are much more important, however, than the economic aspects."

P. F. Brissenden, school of business, Columbia University:

"I am convinced that the economic as well as the moral effects of the repeal of the eighteenth amendment would be salutary. I believe that one result would be a small increase in employment and a considerable increase in public revenues from liquor taxes."

THE COINAGE OF SILVER

Mr. PITTMAN. I introduce a bill which I ask leave to have printed in the RECORD and appropriately referred, together with a memorandum or statement interpretative of it.

The bill (S. 3606) to authorize the purchase by the Government of American-produced silver, to provide for the issuance of silver certificates in payment therefor, to provide for the coinage of such silver, and for other purposes, was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That silver bullion, the product of mines situated in the United States and of reduction works so located, may be deposited at any United States mint for sale to the United States; and the Director of the Mint is directed to purchase silver so tendered, not in excess of 5,000,000 ounces per month, at the market price of silver in the United States as of the date of tender.

SEC. 2. Payment for silver bullion purchased under the provisions of this act shall be made in silver certificates, which shall be issued for that purpose in denominations of $10, $5, and $1, and there is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, so much as may be necessary for carrying out the foregoing provisions of this act. Silver certificates so issued and silver certificates heretofore issued, or any silver certificates reissued, shall be legal tender in payment of all debts, public and private, except where otherwise expressly stipulated in the contract and shall be receivable for customs, taxes, and all public dues. Such certificates, when held by any national banking association or Federal reserve bank, may be counted as a part of its lawful reserve.

SEC. 3. The silver bullion purchased under the provisions of this act shall be coined into standard silver dollars and subsidiary silver coins sufficient, in the opinion of the Secretary of the Treasury, to meet any demands for redemption of silver certificates issued under the provisions of this act, and such coin shall be retained in the Treasury for the payment of such certificates on demand. The bullion so purchased and obtained under this act, except so much thereof as is coined under the provisions of this act, shall be held in the Treasury for the sole purpose of the redemption of the certificates issued hereunder and in the manner herein provided. Any such certificates or reissued certificates, when presented at the Treasury, shall be redeemed in standard silver dollars, or in subsidiary silver coin, at the option of the holder of the certificates: Provided, That in the redemption of such silver certificates issued under this act, not to exceed one-third of the coin required for such redemption shall be made in subsidiary coins, the balance to be made in standard silver dollars.

SEC. 4. When any silver certificates issued under the provisions of this act are redeemed or received into the Treasury from any source whatsoever, and belong to the United States, they shall not be retired, canceled, or destroyed but shall be reissued and paid out again and kept in circulation; but nothing herein shall prohibit the cancellation and destruction of mutilated certificates and the issue of other certificates of like denomination in their stead, as provided by law.

SEC. 5. The Secretary of the Treasury is authorized to make rules and regulations for carrying out the provisions of this act.

The memorandum presented by Mr. PITTMAN to accompany Senate bill 3606 was referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

MEMORANDUM BY SENATOR PITTMAN IN EXPLANATION OF BILL

This bill will not inflate the currency of the country but will enlarge the base for the issue and circulation of currency. At the present time there are outstanding in the United States silver certificates to the amount of $489,633,290, secured by 499,292,344 standard silver dollars.

The Government authorized the coining of standard silver dollars upon the establishment of the mint in 1792.

In 1837 the present standard silver dollar of 412½ grains was established and its coinage authorized.

The coinage ceased between 1805 and 1836 because the price of silver was greater than the value of silver in the standard silver dollar.

In 1873 the coinage of the trade dollar containing 420 grains of silver was authorized.

In 1876 the legal-tender character of the trade dollar was abolished and its coinage authorized to be discontinued.

In 1878 further coinage of the standard silver dollar was authorized, but a change was made in its legal-tender character. By that act it was made legal tender, "except where otherwise expressly stipulated in the contract."

The first issue of silver certificates was made under this act of 1878. It provided for the deposit of standard silver dollars in the Treasury and the issue in lieu thereof of silver certificates. Such certificates were receivable for customs, taxes, and all public dues, and when so received were to be reissued.

By the act of 1886 the issue of silver certificates to redeem silver certificates of larger denomination issued under the act of 1878 was authorized.

Under the act of 1887 trade dollars were melted up and coined into standard silver dollars and silver certificates issued against such standard silver dollars retained in the Treasury.

Silver certificates were also eventually issued under the act of July 14, 1890, as against the standard silver dollars coined under that act.

This is the history of the issuance of the silver certificates outstanding. These certificates have been current and have circulated as lawful money of the United States at par without ever having suffered any depreciation.

This bill proposes that the United States Government buy American-produced silver, when tendered, at the market price, and pay for it by the issuance and delivery of silver certificates of the denominations of $10, $5, and $1; that the silver so purchased shall be retained in the Treasury for coinage into standard silver dollars and subsidiary coins for the redemption of such silver certificates so issued on presentation and demand. These certificates are only redeemable in silver, as are all the other certificates now outstanding.

The bill would add little to the circulating currency of the United States. Under the act the Government is not permitted to purchase over 5,000,000 ounces a month. This limitation at the present time is unnecessary, because the mine production at the present time, according to the estimates of the Department of Commerce and the Bureau of Mines, does not exceed 2,500,000 ounces a month.

At the present time, therefore, if all the silver produced in the United States were tendered to the Government for purchase with silver certificates, silver being only 30 cents an ounce, there would only be about approximately $750,000 in silver certificates issued each month. An increase of $750,000 in silver certificates per month to the outstanding $489,633,290 of silver certificates would be infinitesimal and negligible.

As the outstanding silver certificates are secured not only by the standard silver dollars in the Treasury but by the surplus profits derived by the Government in the purchase of silver far below the value at which it was issued, the parity of such silver certificates has never been threatened.

It must also be borne in mind that said silver certificates are now receivable for customs, taxes, and all public dues. The amount of such certificates is so small that they could all be used for such purposes. This is another reason why such certificates have not depreciated in value.

This bill intends, however, to increase the usefulness of such certificates and the certificates issued under this act by declaring that they shall be legal tender except where otherwise expressly stipulated in the contract, and shall be receivable for customs, taxes, and all public dues, and it is further provided that such certificates when held by any national banking association or Federal reserve bank may be counted as a part of its lawful reserve.

In introducing this bill I do not desire to have my action interpreted as an abandonment of my contention that an international conference is essential for the complete restoration of the purchasing power and exchange functions of silver money in international commerce, nor do I desire my action to be construed as an opposition to other bills introduced in Congress looking to the enlargement of the base of the currency issue.

I submit this bill at this time for the consideration of the groups in the Senate who are interested in the question and the committees to which their various bills relative to silver have been referred.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, I ask leave to have printed in the RECORD at this point and appropriately referred a memorandum prepared by me giving the history of coinage in the United States.

There being no objection, the memorandum was referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

In 1792 there was an act enacted, entitled "An act establishing a mint and regulating the coins of the United States."

There were two standards of value, the gold dollar and the silver dollar. The eagle of the value of $10 contained 247½ grains of pure gold. The silver dollar contained 371¼ grains of pure silver.

The act provided that the gold and silver coins should be lawful tender in all payments whatsoever.

Between 1805 and 1836 the issue of silver dollars was suspended because the price of bullion was above the par value of the silver dollar.

In 1834 the standard of gold coins was changed. The contents of the eagle, a $10 gold piece, was reduced to 232 grains of pure gold, or 258 grains of standard gold.

In 1837 the standard for gold and silver coins was fixed at 900 pure metal and 100 alloy, the alloy of silver coins to be copper and the alloy of gold coins to be copper and silver, provided that silver was not over one-half of the alloy. The weight of coins was also changed. The silver dollar contained 412½ grains. The half-dollar contained 206¼ grains, etc. Gold and silver coins were still maintained as legal tender.

In 1849 the coinage of gold dollars and double eagles was authorized.

In 1853 the weight of subsidiary coins was again changed, as follows: The half dollar contained 192 grains, the quarter dollar, dime, and half dime, a proportionate amount. Subsidiary coins were then made legal tender for sums not exceeding $5. Purchase of silver bullion for the coinage of such subsidiary coins was authorized. It was also provided that such coins could be exchanged for gold coins.

On February 12, 1873, the Bureau of the Mint was established. In this act it was provided, "That the gold coins of the United States shall be a $1 piece, which, at the standard weight of 25.8 grains, shall be the unit of value; a quarter eagle, or $2.50 piece; a $3 piece; a half eagle, or $5 piece; an eagle, or $10 piece; and a double eagle, or $20 piece. And the standard weight of the gold dollar shall be 25.8 grains," etc.

It also provides that the silver coins of the United States shall be a trade dollar; a half-dollar, or 50-cent piece; a quarter-dollar, or 25-cent piece; a dime, or 10-cent piece; and the weight of the trade dollar shall be 420 grains troy; the weight of the half-dollar shall be 12½ grams; all of said silver coins, including the trade dollar, to be legal tender at their nominal value for amounts not exceeding $5 in any one payment.

The act provided that the owners of silver bullion might have it coined into trade dollars.

This act also provided for seigniorage, or profits derived by the Government on the purchase of the bullion and the sale of the coins.

This act eliminated the trade dollar from exchange for gold coins.

By the act of 1875 bullion was purchased and coined into subsidiary coins for the redemption of fractional paper currency.

On July 22, 1876, it was provided that silver coins should be issued and exchanged for legal-tender notes. By this same act it was provided: "That the trade dollar shall not hereafter be a legal tender, and the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized to limit from time to time the coinage thereof to such an amount as he may deem sufficient to meet the export demand for the same." Additional subsidiary coins were authorized.

Under the act of February 28, 1878, standard silver dollars were authorized to be coined. The act provided, "which coins, together with all silver dollars heretofore coined by the United States, of like weight and fineness, shall be a legal tender at their nominal value, for all debts and dues, public and private, except where otherwise expressly stipulated in the contract."

The act also provides for the purchase by the Treasury Department of not less than $2,000,000 and not more than $4,000,000 worth a month of silver to be coined into standard silver dollars.

This act also provided for the calling of an international conference by the President of the United States for the purpose of adopting a common ratio between gold and silver for the purpose of establishing international bimetallic money. The first silver certificates were issued under this act: "Said certificates shall be receivable for customs, taxes, and all public dues, and, when so received, may be reissued."

The act of June 9, 1879, provides that subsidiary silver coins may be exchanged at the Treasury for lawful money of the United States. The act also made subsidiary silver coins legal tender for sums not exceeding $10.

The act of August 4, 1886, issue of silver certificates to redeem silver certificates of large denomination issued under the act of 1878.

The act of February 19, 1887, provided for the exchange of the trade dollar for standard silver dollar or subsidiary coins of the United States. Trade dollars were then melted and coined into standard silver dollars or subsidiary coins. These standard silver dollars were in addition to the standard silver dollars coined under the act of 1878.

The act of July 14, 1890, directed the purchase of 4,500,000 ounces of silver bullion each month at the market price not exceeding $1 for 371.25 grains of pure silver, and to issue in payment for such purchases of silver bullion Treasury notes of the United States. The Treasury notes were redeemable in coin on presentation. The Treasury notes were legal tender in payment of all debts except where otherwise expressly stipulated, and were receivable for customs, taxes, and all public dues, and when received were reissuable. Such notes when held by national banking associations were counted as part of the lawful reserve. The Secretary of the Treasury had discretion as to whether to redeem such notes in gold or silver.

By the act of 1893 the purchasing clause of the act of 1890 was repealed. The act expressly provided: "And it is hereby declared to be the policy of the United States to continue the use of both gold and silver as standard money, and to coin both gold and silver into money of equal intrinsic and exchangeable value, such equality to be secured through international agreement, or by such safeguards of legislation as will insure the maintenance of the parity in value of the coins of the two metals, and the equal power of every dollar at all times in the markets and in the payment of debts. And it is hereby further declared that the efforts of the Government should be steadily directed to the establishment of such a safe system of bimetallism as will maintain at all times the equal power of every dollar coined or issued by the United States, in the markets and in the payment of debts."

The act of March 14, 1900, reiterates the gold dollar as the standard of value, and says, "and all forms of money issued or coined by the United States shall be maintained at a parity of value with this standard, and it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury to maintain such parity."

Again, under the act of 1900, it was provided that, "as fast as standard silver dollars are coined under the provisions of the acts of July 14, 1890, and June 13, 1898, from bullion purchased under the act of July 14, 1890, to retire and cancel an equal amount of Treasury notes whenever received into the Treasury, either by exchange in accordance with the provisions of this act or in the ordinary course of business, and upon the cancellation of Treasury notes silver certificates shall be issued against the silver dollars so coined."

This act also provides for the receipt by the Treasury of gold coins and the issue in exchange therefor of gold certificates.

IMPROVEMENT OF FACILITIES OF THE FEDERAL RESERVE SYSTEM

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, I introduce a bill to improve the facilities of the Federal reserve system for the service of commerce, industry, and agriculture, and so forth, for appropriate reference.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the bill introduced by the Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS] may be printed in full in the RECORD in connection with the day's proceedings.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair hears no objection, and it is so ordered.

The bill (S. 3616) to improve the facilities of the Federal reserve system for the service of commerce, industry, and agriculture, to provide means for meeting the needs of member banks in exceptional circumstances, and for other purposes, was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Federal reserve act, as amended, is further amended by inserting between sections 10 and 11 thereof a new section reading as follows:

"SEC. 10. (a) Upon receiving the consent of not less than six members of the Federal Reserve Board, any Federal reserve bank may make advances, in such amount as the board of directors of such Federal reserve bank may determine, to groups of five or more independently owned and controlled member banks within its district upon their time or demand promissory notes, the liability of the individual banks in each group to be limited to such proportion of the total amount advanced to such group as the deposit liability of the respective banks bears to the aggregate deposit liability of all banks in such group, but such advances may be made to a lesser number of such member banks if the aggregate amount of their deposit liability constitutes at least 10 per cent of the entire deposit liability of the member banks within such district. Such banks shall be authorized to distribute the proceeds of such loans to such of their number and in such amount as they may agree upon, but before so doing they shall request such recipient banks to deposit with a suitable trustee, representing the entire group, their individual notes made in favor of the group protected by such collateral security as may be agreed upon. Any Federal reserve bank making such advance shall charge interest thereon at a rate not less than 1 per cent above its discount rate in effect at the time of making such advance. No such note upon which advances are made by a Federal reserve bank under this section shall be eligible under section 16 of this act as collateral security for Federal reserve notes.

"No obligations of any foreign government, individual, partnership, association, or corporation organized under the laws thereof shall be eligible as collateral security for advances under this section.

"National banking associations are authorized and empowered to indorse or guarantee notes of other member banks evidencing advances made pursuant to the provisions of this section."

SEC. 2. The Federal reserve act, as amended, is further amended by adding, immediately after such new section 10 (a), an additional new section, reading as follows:

"SEC. 10. (b) For a period of not exceeding one year from the date of the approval of this act, and in exceptional and exigent circumstances, and when any member bank has no further eligible and acceptable assets available to enable it to obtain adequate credit accommodations through rediscounting at the Federal reserve bank or any other method provided by this act other than that provided by section 10 (a), any Federal reserve bank, subject in each case to affirmative action by not less than six members of the Federal Reserve Board holding office at the time, may make advances to such member bank on its time or demand promissory notes secured to the satisfaction of such Federal reserve bank: Provided, That (1) each such note shall bear interest at a rate not less than 1 per cent per annum higher than the highest discount rate in effect at such Federal reserve bank on the date of such note; (2) the Federal Reserve Board may by regulation limit and define the classes of assets which may be accepted as security for advances made under authority of this section; and (3) no note accepted for any such advance shall be eligible as collateral security for Federal reserve notes.

"No obligations of any foreign government, individual, partnership, association, or corporation organized under the laws thereof shall be eligible as collateral security for advances under this section."

SEC. 3. The second paragraph of section 16 of the Federal reserve act, as amended, is amended to read as follows:

"Any Federal reserve bank may make application to the local Federal reserve agent for such amount of the Federal reserve notes hereinbefore provided for as it may require. Such application shall be accompanied with a tender to the local Federal reserve agent of collateral in amount equal to the sum of the Federal reserve notes thus applied for and issued pursuant to such application. The collateral security thus offered shall be notes, drafts, bills of exchange, or acceptances acquired under the provisions of section 13 of this act, or bills of exchange indorsed by a member bank of any Federal reserve district and purchased under the provisions of section 14 of this act, or bankers' acceptances purchased under the provisions of said section 14, or gold or gold certificates: Provided, however, That at any time within 12 months from the date of the approval of this act, should the Federal Reserve Board deem it in the public interest, it may, upon the affirmative vote of not less than a majority of its members holding office at the time, authorize the Federal reserve banks to offer, and the Federal reserve agents to accept, as such collateral security, direct obligations of the United States. At the expiration of one year from the approval of this act, or sooner, should the Federal Reserve Board so decide, such authorization shall terminate and such obligations of the United States be retired as security for Federal reserve notes. In no event shall such collateral security be less than the amount of Federal reserve notes applied for. The Federal reserve agent shall each day notify the Federal Reserve Board of all issues and withdrawals of Federal reserve notes to and by the Federal reserve bank to which he is accredited. The said Federal Reserve Board may at any time call upon a Federal reserve bank for additional security to protect the Federal reserve notes issued to it."

HOUSE BILL REFERRED

The bill (H. R. 7716) to amend the radio act of 1927, approved February 23, 1927, as amended (U. S. C., Supp. V, title 47, ch. 4), and for other purposes, was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, a few days ago the senior Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] introduced a bill (S. 2493) touching upon the reduction of salaries of members and employees of the Farm Board. Other bills introduced affecting salaries of employees have been referred to the Committee on Civil Service. The bill of which I have just spoken was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, I think erroneously, and I ask that that committee be discharged from further consideration of the bill and that it be referred to the Committee on Civil Service.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. FESS in the chair). Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

TOMB OF LENIN

Mr. DILL. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an article in the publication called Unity under date of February 8, 1932, by John Haynes Holmes. This is an article describing at some length and in a very remarkable way the tomb of Lenin in Moscow.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE TOMB OF LENIN

I was recently in Moscow strolling about the avenues of the Kremlin, that amazing city built on the top of the hill above the Moscow River as a fortress to resist in ancient times the incursions of Tartar hordes from the distant steppes of Asia. In this city, which was the first Moscow, are many churches, and one of these churches is the burial place of the Kings of Muscovy. We entered the gloomy portal of this church and there saw the marble sarcophagi of some 50 Czars who had reigned before the days of Peter the Great. Some of these Czars were known to us—Ivan the Terrible, who built the gorgeous and grotesque towers of the Cathedral of St. Basil, and Boris Godunov, who was later celebrated in the famous opera by Moussorgsky. But most of them were merely names and we did not even take the trouble to stop and identify their tombs. Here were these kings who had been mighty in their day, who had worn crowns upon their heads and carried scepters in their hands, who had led great armies to great victories on fields of battle, and here their bodies lay unrecognized and almost unvisited. It was not difficult in this ancient church, already tumbling into ruin, to imagine the time when its walls would be only so much dust and its graves not even a memory in men's minds. And I thought of the comment of Washington Irving on the graves in Westminster Abbey, so appropriate here as there:

"This is the empire of death—his great shadowy palace, where he sits in state, mocking at the relics of human glory and spreading dust and forgetfulness on the monuments of princes. How idle a boast, after all, is the immortality of a name. * * * Columns, arches, pyramids, what are they but heaps of sand, and their epitaphs but characters written in the dust?"

But there is another tomb in Moscow. This tomb is outside and not inside the Kremlin wall, not under the gloomy arches of a church but in the open air and sunlight of the day, not hidden away from the eyes and feet of men but placed in a public square where hurried throngs go sweeping by through all the hours alike of day and night. This is the tomb of Lenin—that enormous pile of red marble, gathered in separate blocks from all parts of the Soviet Republic, within which lies the body of the world's greatest revolutionist. The setting is impressive. All about is the wide expanse of the Red Square, which I have come to regard as incomparably the greatest square that I have ever seen in any European city. On one side there stretches the huge bulk of the Kremlin wall, which has stood there for a thousand years as a defense of Czars against their enemies, and during the last two generations as a defense of Czars against their people. At the foot of this wall there lie the graves of several hundred men and women who were killed on the streets of Moscow in the October fighting in 1917, and who are therefore revered as the martyrs of the revolution. Scattered among them are the ashes of certain Americans—John Reed, Bill Haywood, Paxton Hibben. Just in the center, guarded day and night by red sentinels standing ceaselessly at salute, there looms the Tomb of Lenin.

You go there at 7 o'clock in the evening, when it is open to the people, and you see a great line of men, women, and even children reaching to the farthest corner of the square. There are always hundreds, sometimes thousands, of persons waiting to enter the famous sepulcher. You step to the head of the line, announce yourself as an American, and immediately, with that exceeding courtesy characteristic of the Soviets in their relations with foreigners, you are admitted to the solemn portals. You turn to the left and descend a long flight of marble stairs. At the foot of the stairs you turn to the right and find yourself in a large subterranean chamber, in the middle of which lies the body of Lenin, not hidden away in a mausoleum but exposed to view like a recumbent statue. The body is supported by a pedestal and lies as though asleep upon a bed. High above it rises the gable roof of a glass canopy, hermetically sealed, I understand, against the outer air. At head and foot stand sentinels in the familiar uniform of the red soldier and with bayoneted rifles held rigidly at attention.

The body is illuminated with a flood of light, and it is not until you have returned to the gathering darkness of the square above that you realize you have not noticed whence the light comes or how it is shed upon the sleeping figure. The body is clothed in the simple garb of a Russian workman, with no adornment or decoration, except that on the left breast there appears the red emblem of the Order of Lenin. The right arm, if I remember rightly, lies parallel with the body, while the left arm is crossed upon the breast. You stand first at the head, then walk along the length of the body to the feet, where you pause for a moment and gaze at the great man as he lies stretched before you in his unending slumber. Then you walk to the left, again along the line of the body, until you return to the head. There you find yourself at the foot of another long flight of steps which you slowly climb back to the upper air and to the great crowd waiting there to enter the tomb.

I have seen many tombs in my life. I am an indefatigable explorer of cemeteries. I hunt the bones of dead men as archæologists hunt the ruins of dead cities. I have stood by the grave of Darwin in Westminster Abbey, and of William Shakespeare in the little church at Stratford-on-Avon. I have found that lovely corner under the ruined arches of Dryburgh, near the quiet waters of the River Tweed, where rest the bones of the great and good Sir Walter Scott. I have thrice visited the tomb of Napoleon, which I regard as the most splendid monument ever reared by the hand of man to the memory of a great soldier. I never see this sepulcher without thinking of the tomb of General Grant on Riverside Drive in this city, and of that other tomb on the other side of the world, in Damascus, of the great Saladin, where you see upon the casket the huge turban which was worn by this great King of the Saracens and the curved scimitar which he carried into battle. I always love to think of the Tomb of George Washington, so noble in its simplicity, and so beautiful in its ideal location upon the banks of the Potomac River. Very similar to this, located on the highest point of the highest hill overlooking the city of Genoa and the blue waters of the Mediterranean, is the Tomb of Mazzini, who won the same freedom for Italy that Washington won for America. And always there are the tombs of the Pharaohs, those vast chambers of mystery and gloom, hidden away in the gigantic pyramids, or buried deep down through subterranean channels underneath the spreading sands of Egypt. It would seem as though man had exhausted his ingenuity in doing reverence to those whose names he would perpetuate upon the site of the last resting place of their earthly dust. But it has remained for the Bolsheviki of Russia to do what has never been done before.

The one unique and unforgettable feature of the Tomb of Lenin is, of course, the public exhibition of his body. I find it curious that at the very time this spectacle was initiated by the Russians, in the case of a man who had been dead only a comparatively few years, it was definitely abandoned by the Egyptians in the case of men who had been dead for many centuries. For there was a time, and not so long ago, when you could see, in Egypt, the mummified remains of Rameses II, Seti the Great, and others of the kings in the oldest dynasties of history. But when I went to Cairo, in the spring of 1929, and asked to see the face of the Pharaoh who had ruled in Egypt when Moses was a slave, I was told that the royal mummies had been withdrawn from public gaze on the ground that they should no longer be used to satisfy the curiosity of vulgar crowds. But in Moscow there is no feeling of this kind at all. Is it because the Egyptian mummies are kings while Lenin was only a commoner? Is it because the modern Egyptians are superstitious about death, while the Bolsheviki are altogether delivered from such illusions? Or is it because the bodies of the Pharaohs are withered and dried and altogether unlovely, while Lenin's body lies there in simple naturalness and beauty, as though the great man were asleep? I found myself wondering as I looked upon his face, so perfect in its repose as to be well-nigh incredible, if the good Comrade Krupskaya, the widow of Lenin, ever ventures to set foot within this quiet room to gaze again upon the features of the man to whom she gave the devotion of a lifetime of stress and sacrifice.

It is to this matter of the body that one's thoughts are first directed in the Tomb of Lenin. How was this spectacle accomplished? What new process of embalming was discovered by the Russian scientists? We do not know. Information as to what was done has never been given to the world. This is the reason, I suppose, why such curious stories have been told about the phenomenon. Thus it is said that every two weeks or less the glass case is lifted and the body elaborately massaged.

The rumor is persistent that Lenin's real remains have long since been buried in the ground and are there moldering away, while the figure seen is only a wax replica of the body. Such stories, of course, are untrue—the case is sealed, and the body is real. But this only deepens the mystery. All we know is that the Bolsheviki, for reasons good and sufficient to themselves, undertook to embalm the mortal frame of their great leader so that it should never fade away but, on the contrary, be preserved forever to the sight of men. This had never been done before in the same way in human history. But these Bolsheviki did it! They undertook and wrought the miracle. I can only confess, after looking upon this body, that I regard it as one of the most remarkable achievements in human experience—the deliberate preservation of the flesh to immortality. Inevitably you feel a sense of awe as you stand in this strange presence and realize that it is to lie there week after week, year after year, century after century, for an indefinite time to come, so that children to the tenth or the twentieth generation may visit and see it, just as though you and I could go to certain places to-day and see the bodies of Julius Caesar or Plato or Moses.

But one has other and deeper thoughts about this spectacle—or at least may I say that I had such thoughts. Somehow or other as I gazed upon Lenin's face there seemed to sweep over my mind a sense of defeat to match my initial sense of amazing victory. For why should anyone want to preserve this poor garment of the flesh? Why should these Russians desire to show this body to the living gaze of men? Most of us are content to abandon the bodies of our loved ones and thus let the dust return unto the dust from which it came. Many of us—those I feel who are truly wise—are quick to burn the body, so that it may be speedily and cleanly reduced to ashes and scattered to the four winds of heaven. We know that the ancient Egyptians clung to the flesh because they desired to preserve the individuality of the dead into the eternal life on the other side of the grave, since they believed, according to the tenets of their faith, that the body must be preserved if the soul also was to be preserved. The Russians cling to the flesh for what reason if not that they also desire to preserve the individuality of their dead, not on the other side of the grave, to be sure, but on this side of the grave, and find the preservation of the body necessary to this end?

These communists, let me remind you, are materialists, and such expedient is surely the perfect logic of their faith. For they find the wholeness of man's being in the mechanism of his material frame. From their point of view, the body is all that man is within himself; and when this body ceases to function the man himself, so far as his identity is concerned, has come to his final end. Therefore, if the body goes, everything goes, while if the body stays, something at least of the man may yet remain. It is a curious faith, this exclusive reliance upon material phenomena as the essence of reality. For does not all history reveal on the one hand that the physical substance of this world, in whatever forms and shapes it may appear, is bound sooner or later to be extinguished, while on the other hand, there are phases of survival involved in phenomena so intangible, imponderable, invisible that, in sheer desperation, for lack of a better word, we call them spiritual? In saying this I am not now debating the question of the survival of individuality after death. I am simply suggesting the plausibility of that spiritual interpretation of life which accepts this world as the abode of spiritual forces and finds therein certain channels of survival which are themselves innately spiritual. I may be myself the victim of superstition; perhaps I am inextricably caught, as in a trap, by the religious viewpoints in which I have been reared and trained. But I can only confess, as I would be as honest with you as with myself, that what I seemed to see in the Tomb of Lenin was the desperate plight of a group of men who were panic-stricken at the death of their leader, upon whose life all of their destiny at that moment seemed to depend, and who found it therefore impossible that his influence upon the nation should be thus unexpectedly and decisively brought to an end. Something had escaped from them which must not be allowed to escape. Lenin must remain, survive, live on, even though he were dead before them. Yet there was no room in their philosophy for any belief in immortality either here or in the life beyond. Lenin died long before his time in the most critical period of the history of the Republic, and these materialists found themselves thrown deep into the very mystery of life and death, with nothing more substantial to sustain them than the mortal frame of this poor body of their hero. What should they do? What could they do? From the standpoint of their faith, or lack of faith, they did more than has ever hitherto been done in the history of mankind. They kept that body intact, and there it lies to-day as it will lie to-morrow, a real presence in the eyes of men.

But is this enough? Can these men be certain, for all their miracle, that this process of their embalming can endure forever? What if this body should wither and in the course of centuries become another mummy bearing witness only to the inevitable dissolution of things material? What if the chances and changes of this world should bring to this noble tomb what earlier chances and changes have brought to the equally noble tomb of Alexander the Great, whose royal ashes are now lost as definitely and permanently to the world as the ashes of Jesus of Nazareth himself, and the royal sepulchre become a mere exhibit in a public museum? "What is the security of a tomb?" says Washington Irving, in his meditations upon Westminster Abbey. "What is the perpetuity of an embalmment?" Surely the reliance of these Bolsheviki is a frail one. If the flesh is all, how transient is its stay, how feeble its influence, and how pitiful its memory. Is it strange, or perhaps perverse, that in this crowning triumph of the materialism of the Bolsheviki, the preservation of Lenin's body, I seem to see impressive demonstration of the essential reality not of the flesh but of the spirit? "Life," says Herbert Spencer, "is that which persists." But it is the soul which persists and never the body. For "the things which are seen are temporal, but the things which are not seen are eternal."

This is not my only thought, however, of the Tomb of Lenin. What did I see as I gazed upon this recumbent figure in the central shrine of the workingmen's Republic? I saw what Bernard Shaw saw when he looked on Lenin. For it is recorded that Shaw remarked that here was obviously a man who was a thinker and not a worker. Pointing to the delicate hand that lay upon the breast, Shaw said that this was the hand of a man who had not only done no physical labor himself, but whose ancestors for six generations before him had done no labor. I was impressed not so much by the hand as by the head of the great man. What a head! A looming dome that surely housed one of the greatest brains the world has ever known. This is the head of a man not of the proletariat but of the intelligentsia, a man whose life was thought and never labor.

It is true that Lenin loved the workers. It is to his immortal glory that, born to the ranks of those who had escaped the sweat of toil, he returned to the multitudes who, like so many slaves, were doing the weary work of this weary world, and deliberately identified his life with theirs. Do you remember the famous funeral scene when Krupskaya, Lenin's widow, rose up before the commissars and the assembled multitude of comrades, to pay tribute to her dead husband? The whole assembly rose to its feet in silence as this woman appeared before them to speak her word. She could not say to these leaders of the workingmen's revolution that Lenin was himself a workingman, but she did boast, in a voice which rose in pride above the currents of her sorrow, that "the inspiration of his life was his love for all men and women who worked." That love was great. It drove him like steam; it consumed him like flame. But he himself, in heritage and practice, was always outside the ranks of the working classes. When in the beginning the revolution was proclaimed of soldiers, sailors, and peasants, Lenin found his place in no one of these three groups. When later the factory workers added themselves to the soldiers, sailors, and peasants, he still had no place. He could lead these toilers, love them, live with them, if need be die for them, but he could not be one of them.

No; it was the irony of Lenin's fate that what he had to offer to the revolution was what no workingman as such could offer. He fired no gun, for he was not a soldier; he steered no ship, for he was not a sailor; he drove no plow, for he was not a peasant; he turned no wheels, for he was not a machinist. As much as any king he was apart from these workers of land and sea, of field and factory. Yet to their revolution he brought what was indispensable and what he alone could bring. Three things were his gift, the most precious gift that any man ever brought to any vast creative upheaval of human destiny.

First, he brought his vision—the vision of a new commonwealth of man upon the earth, the vision of a day when there should be no wealth among men, and therefore no poverty, but all men be equal in the happy enjoyment of their common heritage of earth. This vision was not unique with him; it has for ages been the vision of all true prophets of the better day for humankind. But he saw this vision with a definiteness of outline, a concreteness of character, and a surety of fulfillment, which are unparalleled. Nor was it his fate to see this vision alone or to die with its glory all hidden away within his secret soul. He conveyed its glory to others and lived to see it rise like a burning sun upon all the vast expanse of the largest country in the world.

Secondly, he brought his thought—a program worked out in the finest detail, a policy projected to the remotest areas of experience, a statesmanship compassing the deepest needs and furthest hazards of great adventure. The thought of Lenin was as creative in its originality and power as the thought of any of the greatest thinkers of human history. It was this capacity and range of thought, as applied to the defense of a great people in the cataclysmic crisis of revolution, which made Lenin in a few short years the greatest statesman that modern times has known.

Lastly, he brought his dedication of spirit—the utter sacrifice of everything that life had to offer to the service of his chosen purpose. It was this devotion which doomed him to a poverty so terrible in its rigor that I can compare it only to the poverty by which Mahatma Grandhi has chosen to discipline his life. Never was there greater singleness of purpose, more utter abnegation of all self-interest, more supreme sacrifice for a cause and crisis than these which Lenin laid down as a voluntary offering upon the altar of mankind.

These were the gifts of Lenin—his vision, his thought, his dedication. It is these gifts which his successors would now perpetuate through all time to come. The Bolsheviki would pass on this precious heritage to generations yet unborn, and again to their children and their children's children. But these gifts are spiritual gifts! And the process of their passing is a spiritual process. By what device shall this contagion of example be perpetuated? Am I wrong in suggesting that, by another one of those ironies which so illumine the pages of history, the Bolsheviki have hit upon a device identical with that which has been used for centuries by no less a body than the Roman Catholic Church? What did I see as I gazed upon the body of Lenin and beheld in this mortal frame the "real presence," so to speak, of the immortal revolutionist? I saw rising up before me, as in a dream, the high mass of the Roman Church where is presented to all of the people the "real presence" of Christ Jesus, their Lord. When that mystic bell goes ringing through the cathedral spaces, as all bow in silent prayer before the altar, there suddenly appears the bread which is the body of Christ and the wine which is His blood. This is the "real presence" of the Redeemer, set, to convey to those who see it, the precious life of Him who lived and died for men. Down through the ages, by this strange device of the mass, has been transmitted the influence of Christ's example, that it may live again through generations unending in the hearts of all who believe in Him and would follow in His steps. What other device than this are the Bolsheviki using in their exhibition of Lenin's body? Is it not the "real presence" which they are attempting to preserve and to transmit, and do they not hope that this "real presence" will work its change within men's hearts and make them live, as Lenin lived, and die, as Lenin died, for the great cause of Russia and her emancipated people? Here again the spirit triumphs. The word becomes flesh, and now the flesh becomes the word, for "man does not live by bread alone, but by every word that proceedeth out of the mouth of God."

There is another and final thought which came to me within that tomb. Here in this reverent spectacle of Lenin's body we see the climax and apotheosis, so to speak, of what is one of the most remarkable phenomena of Soviet Russia. I refer to the omnipresence of Lenin, the living memory of Lenin, from the frontiers of the Republic to the remotest corner of its vast area. Lenin is everywhere. You emerge from the railroad station in Leningrad and there in the public square you see a great statue of the revolutionist reared on the site where he climbed upon a gun carriage on his first entrance into the capital and made his initial speech to the excited crowds. As you proceed upon your way you see other statues, and busts, and pictures, and little images. It is as though the innumerable ikons of the ancient church were now replaced by equally innumerable replicas of the great revolutionist. He appears not only in the public squares and on the streets but in the theaters, opera houses, the art galleries, the public buildings, the parks, the restaurants, the homes. I think I am not exaggerating when I say that there is hardly a public square in Russia which does not have its statue of Lenin, scarcely a hall or corridor which does not have his bust, scarcely a room which does not have his picture. Even on the farms and in the peasant villages hundreds of miles from Moscow we saw in the houses of the people the face of this great man. And here in the Red Square before the Kremlin wall there lies his body, the crown and glory of a process which has captured the imagination of a multitude with the magic of a single name.

There is in Russia to-day a cult of Lenin. This cult has a twofold significance. It is first of all a substitute for the Czar, and thus a new source of patriotism. In the old days, as you know, the Czar was an object of veneration. He was "the Great White Father," who held the devotion of all his people and thus embodied within his person the nation's life. Without the Czar the old Russia could not have been held together, and without Lenin at this hour the new Russia could not be held together. But this Lenin cult has a second significance. It is a substitute not only for the Czar but for God, and is thus a source of religion as well as of patriotism.

I see in the Bolshevik attitude toward Lenin at this hour the beginning of a new religion. It is the religion of a man, to be sure, as Mohammedanism was for years the religion of a man, but it is a religion which leads, like all religions, ultimately to God, by whatever name he may be called and by whatever means he may be worshiped. Russia, we are told, is a godless land. Do not believe it! The old Christianity is no more. This Christianity, a mere travesty of the religion of Jesus, was a compound of ignorance, superstition, and corruption which would bring death to the soul of any people. Of this, thank God, the new soil of Russia is now swept clean, and in its place there springs up this new and strange religion which centers in a man who claimed to know and recognize no God, but who did unwittingly the word and work of God. What this religion, this cult of Lenin, may ultimately become, I do not know. It may well in time develop a new theology and harden into the iron rigidity of a new ecclesiasticism, but to-day it is the passion of a people and centers in the worship of Him who brought them light and life. The Bolsheviki are all unaware of the religious aspects of what they are doing. Thanks to the long betrayal of religion by the Greek Orthodox Church, these Russians have long since lost all understanding of what religion is or ought to be. They would be the first to disclaim the spiritual significance of their work. But if the Tomb of Lenin is not a shrine, and its holy ground, like Mecca, a place of pilgrimage, then I am myself ignorant of religion and know not the revelations of the spirit when I see them.

These are the thoughts which come into my mind as I think back upon that noble tomb where I paused in reverence before the body of Lenin. I feel now, as I felt then, that a divine necessity is upon us. Try as we will, we can not escape the mystery of our origin and the equal mystery of our destiny. In the Tomb of Lenin I see the beginning of Russia's new spiritual life. The Society of the Godless, with its millions of members in Russia, may spread for and wide the dry seeds of its atheism; but here in the Red Square, the center and soul of Bolshevik Russia, there stands this tomb, as the latest of all earth's sacred shrines, to confuse and confound them together. This tomb is the altar of a new religion; this altar is the temple of another faith; this faith is the promise of a greater God and a higher destiny for man.

In conclusion let me describe what was one of the great religious experiences of my life. It was on the last evening of my stay in Moscow. I had wandered into the Red Square a few minutes before midnight to hear the chimes within the Kremlin bell tower. Before me loomed the dark mass of Lenin's tomb. Behind the tomb was the Kremlin wall, looking down upon an area which it had guarded for 10 bloody centuries. Behind the wall were golden domes and lofty towers shining like silver in the flood of moonlight which poured down upon the scene. Silently one by one upon the ramparts of the wall there passed the sentinels, their bayonets gleaming in the molten light. I waited for the hour to strike, watching the motionless guards before the portal of the tomb, or the domes upon Ivan's grotesque cathedral, or the great clock as clear as day upon the tower. Suddenly, above the shuffle of passing feet and the distant roar of the city, there sounded the 12 strokes of midnight. As the last tone died away it seemed as though for the first time a hush fell upon the square. Then quickly, after a long interval of silence, there came sounding through the night the music of the chiming bells as they rang the anthem of the Internationale—

"Arise, ye prisoners of starvation * * *"

In cascades of pealing sound, like music pouring from the heavens, the great hymn went flooding the vast spaces of the city. As I listened I thought I heard the voices, not of angels but of all the tired toilers of all the ages gone, now at last made glad and free in the release of their brethren upon earth. Suddenly, as I looked at Lenin's tomb it seemed as though out of darkness there sprang a flame to consume injustice and light the paths of men. And it was a flame, or very like a flame, for there, high up above the mausoleum, there floated in one clear shaft of light the red flag.

The chimes were silent. I seemed to hear again the clamor of the city. The moon disappeared behind a looming dome, and Lenin's tomb was swallowed in great darkness. I turned back to the Square of the Revolution and my hotel, and as I saw the night slowly passing into the early dawn of the new day, I said to my comrade at my side, "This is religion, and Lenin is its prophet."

INTERNAL-REVENUE RECEIPTS AND FEDERAL-AID PAYMENTS

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a letter from Acting Assistant Secretary of the Treasury Ballantine. It contains very interesting facts and statistics regarding internal-revenue receipts collected in each State and the total Federal-aid payments made to each State during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1931.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The letter is as follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF ASSISTANT SECRETARY,
Washington, February 6, 1932.

Miss MARY G. KILBRETH,
Chairman Board of Directors,
The Woman Patriot Corporation,
712 Jackson Place NW., Washington, D. C.

MADAM: In compliance with the request contained in your letter of February 1, 1932, for information showing the percentage of (1) internal-revenue receipts collected in each State, and (2) the total Federal-aid payments made to each State, during the fiscal year 1931, there are inclosed herewith statements showing—

a. Amounts and percentages of the income taxes collected in each State during the fiscal year 1931.

b. Amounts and percentages of total internal-revenue taxes collected in each State during the fiscal year 1931. (The figures contained in this statement are on the basis of warrants issued.)

c. Amounts and percentages of total Federal-aid payments made to each State during the fiscal year 1931.

You will appreciate, of course, the limitations of data representing Federal tax collections in a particular State and the care with which such data must be used in the interest of accuracy. Receipts from internal revenue collected in a particular State, for example, do not necessarily correspond with the amounts which the people of that State ultimately pay toward the expenses of the Government. While the individual reporting income in a certain State is usually a resident of that State, his income is often derived from sources in another State. Also, corporations, particularly the larger ones, pay their income tax in the State in which the principal places of business or the financial headquarters are maintained, although their physical properties may be located in an entirely different State or section of the country and the greater part of their profits from sales derived from many States. It is impossible, therefore, to obtain the exact contribution of any particular State to the support of the Federal Government.

The amounts of expenditures made by the Government as direct payments to the several States and Territories, usually under cooperative arrangements, and ordinarily referred to as "Federal aid to States," are shown in the statement referred to in "c" above. These figures have been compiled from the records of the Treasury so far as possible and in other cases from information furnished by other departments or Government establishments having administrative control of the appropriations. The expenditures of the Government for the carrying on of its own functions within the States, such as the collection of taxes, constructing and maintaining Federal buildings, public-health activities, under the Treasury Department; military posts and operations, under the War Department; reclamation projects, national parks, under the Department of the Interior; district courts and other judicial functions, under the Department of Justice, etc., are not included in this statement. Complete statistical information of this character can be obtained only from the departments or Government establishments having administrative control over the appropriations involved.

By direction of the Secretary.
Respectfully,

A. A. BALLANTINE,
Assistant Secretary of the Treasury.

PROHIBITION—MINER'S PROSECUTION

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a couple of communications on the subject of prohibition and a copy of an indictment against a citizen of Tennessee by one of the courts of Kentucky, which was sent to me with the request that it be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the matter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Hon. ALBEN W. BARKLEY,
United States Senator, Kentucky.

DEAR SIR: We, the undersigned, and the societies we represent, are unalterably opposed to any movement for the resubmission of the eighteenth amendment, which would only augment the present agitation; would cause great expense to the people; would hinder enforcement of the law, and no matter what the outcome, would not result in any cessation of the hostility of the enemies of prohibition.

Prohibition is entitled to a fair chance, so we ask you to vote no.

Mrs. W. H. DOOLEY,
President Salt Lick (Ky.) W. C. T. U.
ROSAMOND M. SEESE,
President Salt Lick Woman's Club.

P. S.—Please print this letter in the RECORD.

BOWLING GREEN, KY., January 27, 1932.

To Senators M. M. LOGAN and ALBEN W. BARKLEY,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIRS: In view of the many bills that have been submitted to Congress by the opponents of prohibition, we, the undersigned, urge that you use your influence and cast your vote in support of the maintenance of the prohibition law and its enforcement, and against any measure looking toward its modification, resubmission to the States, or repeal, and that this petition be printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

Mrs. S. H. BROWN,
President W. C. T. U.
Mrs. W. H. ARNOLD,
Vice President.
Mrs. JOHN L. PAGE,
Treasurer.
Mrs. W. D. BUCKBERRY,
Secretary.
Mrs. CLAUDE THOMAS,
Corresponding Secretary.

UNITED MINE WORKERS OF AMERICA,
Jellico, Tenn., December 31, 1931.

Hon. ALBEN W. BARKLEY,
Member United States Senate,
Senate Chamber, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR: Inclosed you will please find copy of indictment returned against me by the Harlan County grand jury December 15, 1931.

After seven months they were able to secure a letter I wrote to the local union secretary at Evarts, Ky., and these gentlemen who appeared before the grand jury are retained in the prosecution in all the cases arising out of the trouble in Harlan County.

They have went far and looked deep in connection with my conduct in this affair, and after seven months they find this letter; this should show any fair-minded man how things are conducted in that county.

I am respectfully requesting that you have this transcript read into the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD from the floor of the Senate to show how far they will go to try and get something on those who are trying to better the conditions of the coal miner, his wife and children.

I have been an officer of the United Mine Workers of America since December 4, 1917, and have at no time ever been arrested for any activity in behalf of my organization.

Thanking you in advance for this favor, I am,

Yours respectfully,

WM. TURNBLAZER.

P. S.—This same letter was used in Federal court at London, Ky., May 18, and the court, after reading same, refused to restrain me in three injunction suits.

THE COMMONWEALTH OF KENTUCKY, PLAINTIFF, v. W. M. TURNBLAZER, DEFENDANT—INDICTMENT FOR MURDER

On motion of the Commonwealth's attorney, Hon. W. A. Brock, Della B. Keller is appointed official stenographer of the grand jury, and she is directed to make true and correct and complete transcript of all evidence heard before the grand jury in the above-styled investigation.

Fred M. Jones, after being duly sworn by the foreman of the grand jury, states as follows:

Q. What is your name?—A. Fred M. Jones.

Q. What do you want to tell, Fred?—A. Here is what I want to tell you about—is about Bill Turnblazer. We have got a copy of the official letter he wrote down here. Here is a copy of it, copied by the official stenographer down there at Mount Sterling [letter is read to grand jury from the court record taken at Mount Sterling, Ky., as follows]:

Mr. W. B. JONES,
Evarts, Ky.

DEAR SIR AND BROTHER: I am inclosing a letter from the chief of police of Jefferson City, Tenn., which I have advised him to get in touch with you, and in the event you do not hear from him I suggest you write him, and after reading the letter to your local union or issuing it to the president I wish you would return it to my files.

I wrote him a very nice letter thanking him for his kind offer and pointed out to him the wonderful fight you are making against the coal operators in Harlan County.

May I also say in this connection that I have been in many coal fields in this country, but I have never seen a better spirit among men than that displayed by the men at Black Mountain and Clover Fork. I point out that it was just such fighting that gave birth to our organization 41 years ago that your men are making. Men may as well die fighting against starvation and inhuman treatment and bad working conditions if you work and starve at the same time and receive nothing for their labor.

Tell the boys to continue to carry on, and I only wish that I had some of the men with the fighting spirit here in Tennessee that you have at Black Mountain. We have a number of discharged cases and also house cases, and are putting up the best fight we know how. Received a letter from President Hoover in regard to my telegram, in which he advised the Red Cross national chairman was sending down an agent to make investigations. Just don't know what this will mean, but we will live in hope that some assistance will be given our people.

With the hope that victory will crown our efforts, I am,

Yours fraternally,

W. M. TURNBLAZER.

Q. Did Jones get this letter?—A. This letter was received by Jones from Turnblazer and was brought out in court that he read it two or three times to the men in his speeches up there.

Witness excused.

J. B. Snyder, after being duly sworn by the foreman of the grand jury, states as follows:

Q. What do you want to tell, Mr. Snyder?—A. I don't know; I suppose it is about the same thing that Fred was in here on.

Q. About this letter from Turnblazer?—A. Yes; here is the record that has the letter in it from Turnblazer written to W. B. Jones. I suppose you all have read it; it was shown in court at Mount Sterling, and Jones admitted getting it; we have the original letter; if you would like to see it, I can get it.

Q. Well, this is a certified copy, isn't it?—A. Yes; that was taken by the court reporter down there.

Q. Well, if that is all, you may go.

Witness excused.

STATE OF KENTUCKY,

County of Harlan, ss:

I, Della B. Keller, official stenographer for the grand jury, do hereby certify that the above is a true and correct and complete transcript of the evidence heard before the grand jury in the investigation of the Commonwealth of Kentucky v. W. M. Turnblazer, charged with the murder of Jim Daniels, etc.

Given under my hand this December 24, 1931.

RELIEF OF UNEMPLOYMENT

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 3045) to provide for cooperation by the Federal Government with the several States in relieving the hardship and suffering caused by unemployment, and for other purposes.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. President, I am in receipt of a telegram from the Manchester Chamber of Commerce, relating to the pending measure, which I ask may be inserted in the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the telegram was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SOUTH MANCHESTER, CONN., February 10, 1932.

Hon. HIRAM BINGHAM,

Senator from Connecticut, Washington, D. C.:

La Follette-Costigan Federal unemployment relief bill strongly opposed by Manchester Chamber of Commerce. Manchester Emergency Employment Association (Inc.) is adequately taking care of local situation. Our board of directors authorize chamber's official protest be wired you, as our policy deplores Federal appropriations for direct aid, which we believe should and can be taken care of by individual communities or the State.

THE MANCHESTER CHAMBER OF COMMERCE,
E. J. MCCABE, Executive Secretary.

Mr. COSTIGAN resumed and concluded the speech begun by him yesterday. His speech follows entire:

Wednesday, February 10, 1932

Mr. COSTIGAN. Mr. President, with the consent of the Senate, I send to the desk and ask to have read an editorial appearing in the St. Louis Post-Dispatch on Friday, February 5, 1932, entitled "At Grips with Starvation."

There being no objection, the editorial was read, as follows:

AT GRIPS WITH STARVATION

As the days pass growing numbers of the unemployed are threatened with actual starvation. The funds from private charitable organizations are approaching exhaustion and local governments are nearing the end of their resources. In New York City welfare agencies have certified 245,000 families as deserving relief. Of these, 138,000 are now receiving aid, but 107,000 other needy families are being turned away for want of funds. Philadelphia has 65,000 families on its charity rolls; but the money with which it is averting starvation will be exhausted by the 1st of May. In Chicago half a million people are dependent on charitable funds, which are rapidly coming to an end, and the city government is virtually bankrupt. In St. Louis the funds of the citizens' committee are virtually exhausted, no new applications for aid are being taken, and the city's present relief work will have to be discontinued in six weeks if additional funds are not obtained meanwhile. Miss Helen Hall, of the University of Pennsylvania settlement, in a survey made for the National Settlement Association, has found that the relief funds of 19 out of 20 American cities will be exhausted by the first of July; in many areas outside of the cities charitable funds are nonexistent, and the suffering is already even more acute.

It is perfectly clear that private charity and local government have failed to meet the need. In many places constitutional and statutory limits on borrowing and on taxation make it impossible for States or municipalities to secure the further funds which the need demands. It is this situation which has given rise to the demand for Federal relief, and it now seems highly probable that some sort of Federal appropriation will be voted by the present session of Congress. The La Follette-Costigan bill, which is now under consideration, would provide $375,000,000 for relief. Of this amount, $125,000,000 would be available before the end of the present fiscal year; the other $250,000,000 in the coming year. It is natural and proper that Congress should have hesitated to take this step. The expenditure of Federal funds for charitable relief will be a new departure in American policy. It will be a cause for justifiable apprehension to all those who fear to see Congress yield to political demands upon the Public Treasury. It runs counter to the well-established principle of local responsibility. But when we are faced with the unhappy alternative of Federal relief or actual starvation, even this principle must give way. Humanity can not long hesitate to make this decision. And it can not be questioned that this is, indeed, the issue. Committees of the Senate and the House have taken the testimony of scores of welfare administrators, sober experts, representing public and private charity in every part of the country. And it is their unanimous and undisputed opinion that Federal aid is the only way out.

Nor should the serious state of the Federal finances prevent action. The $375,000,000 which the La Follette-Costigan bill would appropriate would be but a drop in the bucket of the Federal deficit. Beside the sums spent on armaments, on the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, on the soldier bonus, it is insignificant. It could most certainly be covered by an increase in estate taxes and income surtaxes in the coming year. In 1929, 38 American citizens enjoyed private incomes which totaled over $360,000,000, an amount which nearly equals the sum which is now demanded for the prevention of widespread starvation. It would require a callous indifference to human misery not to tax such great wealth in order to supply hundreds of thousands of our people with a minimum of food. Certainly taxation is to be preferred to malnutrition and the physical degeneration, disease, vice, crime, and violence which it brings in its train.

The measure which is now before Congress would meet the crying need for relief with a minimum of waste and inefficiency. Forty per cent of the appropriation would be distributed among the States in proportion to population, with the provision that no State should receive an amount greater than two-thirds of its own relief expenditures. The other 60 per cent would be available for emergency assistance wherever needed. These funds would be distributed locally through existing, functioning agencies, while the entire project would be supervised by a Federal board. The participation of Miss Grace Abbott, of the Children's Bureau, in its administration should serve as a guaranty of its honesty and humanity.

Mr. COSTIGAN. Mr. President, before the discussion to which the Senate has so patiently listened shall be concluded, it is, as I am advised, the purpose of the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] to make some further observations. Doubtless, also, it is appropriate for me to add certain indorsements of the pending bill and some relevant comments received since the discussion began.

The senior Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] referred yesterday, in his thoughtful address, to a report on road building by leading social workers. They were deservedly mentioned by the Senator from Montana in terms of respect. Among them were several chief witnesses who appeared before the Committee on Manufactures and testified during that committee's hearings. Since the present debate began a statement has been received on conclusions reached by eight members of that committee with respect to the so-called substitute offered in the Senate by the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH], the Senator from Alabama [Mr. BLACK], and the Senator from Ohio [Mr. BULKLEY]. I wish to read the memorandum received by me which is addressed to Members of the Senate. It is dated New York City, February 6, 1932, and reads as follows:

To Members of the United States Senate:

We should like to present very strongly our opposition to the amendment offered by Senators, BLACK, WALSH, and BULKLEY as a substitute for Senate bill 3045, particularly as to the appropriation of $375,000,000 for loans to the States for unemployment relief.

This substitute does not contain the safeguards necessary to prevent unwise administration of relief, to prevent a tremendous waste of Federal funds, and to prevent the discouragement or drying up of the use of State and local resources. These safeguards are contained in the Costigan-La Follette bill (S. 3045), and we believe that appropriations for unemployment relief should be made in the form therein outlined.

HOWARD S. BRAUCHER.	BENSON Y. LANDIS.
HELEN CROSBY.	H. L. LURIE.
JOHN A. FITCH.	LINTON B. SWIFT.
PAUL U. KELLOGG.	WALTER M. WEST.

It should be added, with respect to this report, that in an accompanying letter from Mr. Swift under date of February 6, 1932, he recites that the statement I have read was adopted at a meeting of the committee on February 6 as an expression of the individual opinions of the signers on pending legislation.

One of the most noted child-welfare workers in America, Mr. Owen R. Lovejoy, in a letter addressed to me on February 6, 1932, has this to say, in part:

If an individual letter will do any good and if it is not too late, I want to express my hearty indorsement of the Costigan-La Follette bill providing $375,000,000 for Federal relief.

I have heard some opposition expressed here on the ground that while some sections of the country may need this aid, New York does not need it. My work in connection with the Children's Aid Society naturally brings me into intimate contact with many needy families in the city who have never appealed to the customary relief societies. From my personal knowledge there are many families that need relief that is not likely to be forthcoming through any of the agencies, public or private, now operating in this city. At least 50 per cent of the families that are registered with the city department of public welfare in its relief campaign are unknown to any of the private charitable agencies.

My two chief reasons for favoring your bill are the following:

First, I believe this is a national disaster and requires national treatment. The delay of the Federal Government for over two years to offer relief, either by extensive work programs or by aiding families, has, I believe, contributed to the present national plight which should be alleviated without further delay.

Second. I believe the program of Federal relief will stimulate the action of the local communities. It is frequently objected that if the Federal Government makes an appropriation it will tend to dull a sense of local responsibility.

It will be recalled that this objection was urged to-day by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. FESS].

The letter continues:

My observation in connection with many Federal appropriations leads me to believe that States and local communities, like individuals, are sufficiently controlled by motives of self-interest, so that the knowledge that 40 per cent of the amount they use will be returned from the Federal Government will act as a direct and powerful stimulant.

In support of Mr. Lovejoy's contention that Federal grants will not discourage local endeavors to raise supplementary funds, it appears desirable at this time to refer to an article by Mr. Paul U. Kellogg, editor of the Survey Graphic Magazine, published in New York City, for February, 1932, under the title, "Relief Needs."

Mr. Kellogg has in view the fact that the Legislature of New York, which was called into special session by the governor this last year, made a substantial appropriation for State unemployment relief, resulting in the stimulation of further activities by townships, cities, and counties.

Mr. Kellogg, in the course of his article, says:

In New York State there was a disposition at first to regard the twenty million relief fund, to be drawn from the State income tax, as easy money to be had by local political units for the asking. It is turning out the other way. It is proving a force which is melting township, city, and county appropriations which were frozen before. To get the State funds they must do their part; they must demonstrate needs and resources. The emergency system will bring to the rescue of the unemployed of New York State three or four times the money provided in the State act itself. More than that, it is lifting the standard of relief to a level which our civilization can stand for. (A few beans and a bucket of coal now and then do not qualify under the New York act.) It has uncovered areas where conditions were neglected and desperate. It has provoked constructive action by industries and local officials. It has called for an entirely new caliber of investigation and social service in dealing with the cases. With all its limitations as an emergency set-up starting from scratch, it is proving a modern social installation to meet a crisis.

This page could be given up to a recital of abuses in the past in the administration of public outdoor relief, to forebodings as to how Federal aid might be mishandled in this emergency. But to say that because there is danger in such aid we should never use it is like saying that because there are explosions in gasoline we should stick to horse-drawn vehicles. After all, social advances can be as real as mechanical. Public relief can be a leverage instead of a crutch.

Throughout the length and breadth of the country there are resources, good will, and helpfulness, which can be brought to bear to tide over the hard months of winter and spring and after. But there are too many of those resources which are inert, fragmentary, at cross purposes. Federal aid rightly handled, through the States and by direct action where necessary, could serve as a magnet to galvanize and organize the whole field.

We must not forget that the heavy end of the burden of industrial unemployment comes down on the families of wage earners for whom we can not supply work. So far as American industries are concerned—they have not sufficient work nor part-time work to give—hundreds of thousands of such households would be hungry to-day. So far as the voluntary aid of our American charitable funds go—they have not the wherewithal to succor them—hundreds of thousands would be hungry. Those households are depending on public aid—town and city and county and in some instances State. The question is not merely whether or not we need to fall back on the final Federal trench line of public aid. The question is whether or not we supply national leadership in uniting all these sources of succor into a common front of defense.

Mr. President, in connection with another phase of our discussion it is also appropriate to extract from the address of Mr. Jouett Shouse, chairman of the Democratic national executive committee, placed in the RECORD this afternoon by the Senator from Maryland [Mr. TYDINGS], the following paragraph:

What, after all, is the so-called dole? If it be a dole for the Federal Government to make an appropriation to feed starving people, is it any the less a dole for these people to accept aid at the hands of private charities or at the hands of city or county or State? I for one believe that every private agency should be used to the uttermost to take care of those who can not find employment and who are in destitution and want. But if through the agency of private benefaction the situation can not be cared for, if appropriations made by city, county, and State prove inadequate and can not be enlarged, then, so far as I am concerned, I am in favor of direct appropriation by the Feneral Government to prevent American men, women, and children from starving during the remaining months of this winter. If that be a dole, then make the most of it.

Within the last few days I have received the following letter, with accompanying certified resolutions, from Mr. Thomas Kennedy, secretary-treasurer of the United Mine Workers of America. They are dated Indianapolis, Ind., February 5, 1932:

UNITED MINE WORKERS OF AMERICA,
Indianapolis, Ind., February 5, 1932.

Hon. E. P. COSTIGAN,
United States Senator,
Senate Office Building, Washington, D. C.

HONORABLE AND DEAR SIR: I inclose herewith copy of resolution adopted by the thirty-second constitutional convention of the United Mine Workers of America at its session in Indianapolis, Ind., January 28, 1932, giving the support of our organization and the membership thereof to the bills introduced by yourself and Senator LA FOLLETTE to provide relief for the unemployed.

Respectfully,

THOS. KENNEDY, Secretary-Treasurer.

Whereas Senators LA FOLLETTE and COSTIGAN have introduced measures in the United States Senate calling for the appropriation of $375,000,000 for direct relief, a substantial part of which is to be made available immediately, and also for a $5,000,000,000 bond issue for work relief along the lines of Government construction; and

Whereas we believe that both bills are of vital importance, and if adopted by the Congress of the United States will be the means of providing immediate direct relief, and the program on construction will do much to light the spark that will turn us in the way of more or less relative prosperity; and

Whereas President John L. Lewis, of our organization, has appeared before the Senate committee in support of this legislation; and

Whereas these bills are now reported out of committee favorably and are on the calendar of the Senate: Therefore be it

Resolved by the thirty-second regular convention of the United Mine Workers of America in session at Indianapolis, Ind., That we indorse the La Follette-Costigan bills for direct relief and work relief, and we urge upon the Senate and upon the House of Representatives the adoption of these measures in the best interests of not only the people but of the Government itself; and be it further

Resolved, That copies of this resolution be forwarded to the President of the United States, the United States Senators, and the Members of the House of Representatives of the Congress, and also to the American Federation of Labor.

I hereby certify that the above is a true and correct copy of resolution adopted by the thirty-second regular convention of United Mine Workers of America at Indianapolis, Ind., January 28, 1932.

THOS. KENNEDY,
International Secretary-Treasurer,
United Mine Workers of America.

It should be stated in connection with the reference contained in the resolution to the authorship of the bill on public works that the particular public works bill mentioned should be credited to the able Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE].

Here is a letter from Mr. Andrew J. Biemiller, secretary of the Philadelphia Conference of the Joint Committee on Unemployment, written February 6, 1932. It contains these statements:

The inclosed resolutions were passed unanimously by a mass meeting of 350 delegates of labor, civic, and religious organizations on Wednesday night. They have been forwarded to all Philadelphia Congressmen and to Senators REED and DAVIS. I also inclose a copy of the conference program.

The relevant resolution, selected from others transmitted with this communication, reads as follows:

Whereas there is indisputable evidence that there is widespread distress among the millions of unemployed workers in the United States; and

Whereas private relief agencies and local governmental bodies are unable to supply adequate relief: Therefore be it

Resolved, That this mass meeting calls on the Congress of the United States to pass Senate bill 3045, providing Federal funds for direct relief; and be it further

Resolved, That this money be granted as direct Federal relief and not as loans to States, counties, or municipalities; and be it further

Resolved, That a copy of this resolution be sent to Senators REED and DAVIS and to all Philadelphia Congressmen.

[At this point Mr. COSTIGAN yielded the floor for the day.]

Thursday, February 11, 1932

Mr. COSTIGAN. Mr. President, Mr. John A. Simpson, the able president of the Farmers' Educational and Cooperative Union of America, has just sent a letter reading as follows:

THE FARMERS' EDUCATIONAL AND CO-OPERATIVE UNION OF AMERICA,
Oklahoma City, Okla., February 10, 1932.

Senator EDWARD P. COSTIGAN,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR FRIEND: While the National Farmers' Union program does not include the question of Federal charity aid to the needy, because we insist it is the duty of the Government to furnish every worthy citizen an opportunity to make a living for himself and family, but after three years of futile efforts on the part of the Administration to solve the unemployment and the farmers' no-price problem and there are so many millions in the United States to-day suffering for want of food and clothing, as national president of the Farmers' Union, I indorse the bill you have sponsored providing for Government aid.

The Constitution of the United States provides that Congress shall be the law-making body of the Nation. One hundred and twenty million citizens, patiently, hopefully, and prayerfully, are waiting to see whether the Members of this Congress have the courage of legislating in the interest of the people in the face of advice, instruction, and intimidation on the part of bureaus, commissions, and other departments of Government, all of whom get their orders from the ultra-rich as represented by the international bankers.

It is my firm belief that these Sampsons of finance are blind, and are about to pull the temple down on their own heads.

Yours truly,

JOHN A. SIMPSON, President.

Permission has also been given to use a telegram addressed to the Senators from Iowa [Mr. BROOKHART and Mr. DICKINSON] under date February 1, 1932, from the Iowa State Federation of Labor, J. C. Lewis, president, and Michael E. Sherman, secretary and treasurer, referring to relief conditions in Iowa, reading as follows:

Bread lines and soup kitchens maintained and supplied by wage-earners, most of whom are on part-time employment, have been established in several industrial centers in the State. Other relief agencies are also taxed far beyond their capacity. Hundreds are fed each day at the Des Moines labor temple, where food is also being sent out to families. Extreme cold weather the last few days has added to the seriousness of the situation. Thousands of families are in want of food, clothing, and fuel. Many cases where children are going to school hungry. The Iowa State Federation of Labor with all its affiliated unions urge you to support Senate bill 3045 introduced by Senators COSTIGAN and LA FOLLETTE providing for appropriation of $375,000,000 to be used for relief purposes in cities, towns, and States throughout the Nation.

A telegram of February 2, 1932, addressed jointly to the Senators from California [Mr. JOHNSON and Mr. SHORTRIDGE] from the Los Angeles Central Labor Council, J. W. Buzzell, secretary-treasurer, reads:

FEBRUARY 2, 1932.

SAMUEL SHORTRIDGE and HIRAM JOHNSON,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

There are 93,000 unemployed men registered with the social agencies in Los Angeles, State legislative unemployment committee reports over half million unemployed men in California, thousands of them and their families in absolute want. City has spent nearly eight millions to relieve situation, reaching end of its resources, and La Follette-Costigan bill would materially aid in feeding hungry people here and in other cities in the United States. We urge your support and vote for this bill.

J. W. BUZZELL,
Secretary Los Angeles Central Labor Council.

A telegram dated February 10, 1932, from Madison, Wis., reads as follows:

Madison (Wis.) chapter of American Association of Social Workers has indorsed theory of Federal relief for unemployment. Please use your influence to secure Federal legislation.

SOPHIA SIEBECKER,
Chairman Madison Chapter.

Here is a telegram from New York City, dated February 5, 1932, addressed to me:

The executive committee of the Lower East Side Community Council, whose membership consists of 130 social, religious, educational, and civic organizations on New York's lower East Side, commends your introduction of emergency relief measure and strongly urges its passage.

IDA OPPENHEIMER,
Executive Secretary.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from New York?

Mr. COSTIGAN. With pleasure.

Mr. COPELAND. The Senator from Colorado may have noticed in the press this morning that 79 stations were opened yesterday in New York with a registration of persons out of work and families without means of support.

Mr. COSTIGAN. I thank the Senator for his addition to our information.

A letter from Miss Louise McGuire, chairman of Washington Chapter of the American Association of Social Workers, under date of February 8, 1932, says:

NATIONAL CATHOLIC SCHOOL OF SOCIAL SERVICE,
Washington, D. C., February 8, 1932.

Hon. EDWARD P. COSTIGAN,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: At a meeting held Tuesday evening, February 5, the Washington Chapter of the American Association of Social Workers passed the following resolution:

"Resolved, In view of the fact that State and local community resources, both public and private, have practically reached the point of exhaustion, Federal aid is necessary in order to deal with the present unemployment emergency."

The members of the Washington chapter have given serious thought to the inadequacy of State and local relief resources. The association is aware of the fact that in many sections of the country existing resources are entirely inadequate to meet the present serious emergency. If the Federal Government fails to come to the rescue, there is bound to be serious suffering this winter.

We ask your immediate action.

LOUISE MCGUIRE,
Chairman of the Washington Chapter of the American Association of Social Workers.

A letter dated February 8, 1932, written by Mr. Matthew Randall, a member of a leading law firm in Philadelphia, with offices in the Girard Building, draws attention to a recent article in the Philadelphia Record, of which Mr. Randall says:

If you have not already read the inclosed clipping, it may interest you and possibly be of some aid in your fight for the passage of the bill which you and Senator LA FOLLETTE are pressing for the benefit of the unemployed.

Judge Stern holds the entire respect of our community. He is an able and learned jurist and his opinions receive great consideration from the bar. In addition, he is a man who is always in the forefront of all charitable movements for the relief of those in distress.

In my opinion, the argument which he advances in support of our State law will apply with equal force to your bill and repudiates the assertion that it in any way sets up a "dole."

With best wishes for your success, I remain.

The article apparently deals with the question of the constitutionality of relief appropriations in Pennsylvania. The attorney general of that State has expressed the opinion, as testified by Governor Pinchot when he appeared before the Committee on Manufactures, that legislation by the State of Pennsylvania providing appropriations for the unemployed is unconstitutional. That opinion, it is said, is based on a provision in the Pennsylvania constitution in effect prohibiting legislation granting charity to any individual in that State. The article accompanying the letter of Mr. Randall contains the following original and suggestive construction of the Pennsylvania constitution by the jurist therein quoted:

"Fundamental concepts of our social organization" are involved in the test of the constitutionality of the Talbot Act, according to President Judge Horace Stern, of common pleas No. 2. He is one of the city's outstanding jurists and has been a leader in philanthropic endeavors during the past decade.

To save the time of the Senate I omit portions of the discussion. The article continuing quotes Judge Stern as saying:

Does anybody think that the governors of the various States are calling legislatures together to give charity? Does anybody think that the English Government pays the so-called dole to so many millions of English people in the sense of charity in which that word is ordinarily used? Would anybody say that the La Follette-Costigan direct aid bill now pending in Congress is an act of charity on the part of the United States Government?

I would call those acts not acts of charity but economic acts, acts of an industrial and economic nature, the same as a tariff bill or a bill regulating the hours of labor, or any other bill passed by the legislature, but not an act of charity.

Indeed, they are aimed to do exactly—

The statement agrees with what was averred yesterday in his eloquent address by the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH]—

Indeed, they are aimed to do exactly for human life what the Federal $2,000,000,000 Reconstruction Corporation is to do for banking and commercial life—keep it alive until normal times return, and, indeed, so that they may return.

Another indorsement of the pending measure, dated February 9, 1932, has been received from the Woman's College of Alabama at Montgomery, Ala. This letter of transmittal was addressed to Prof. John Dewey, of New York, by whose authority I use the indorsement on this occasion.

The petition, dated February 6, 1932, reads as follows:

FEBRUARY 6, 1932.

Hon. HUGO BLACK,
Senate Office Building, Washington, D. C.

HONORABLE SIR: The faculty and students of the Woman's College of Alabama, along with all thoughtful citizens, are deeply concerned over the present economic situation. In order to have this interest intelligent rather than sentimental, the Young Women's Christian Association and the league forum have sponsored since last October a series of serious discussion periods with outstanding Montgomerians as speakers, upon economic problems and social obligations. The large group of interested participants in these discussion periods wishes to urge you to use your influence to dispatch Federal action on unemployment relief.

The Senate bill sponsored by you for the appropriation of funds for public works is laudable. It is a step in the direction of permanent solution without resort to palliative measures. However, we feel that serious social ills require drastic treatment. We therefore urge you either to support the Costigan-La Follette bill, S. 3045, or to amend your own bill to make available Federal funds for the immediate and direct relief of the unemployed. We disapprove of the dole, but we disapprove much more heartily of undernourished and starving children. A sense of social responsibility should move us all to face intelligently and fearlessly the present social disaster.

The original petition is signed by Montine Lisenby, president of the student body; Frances Bates, president of the athletic association; Helen Wright, president of the senior class; Mary Gillen, State president of the Young Women's Christian Association; Edna Earle Smith, president of the Woman's College, Young Women's Christian Association; Dot Lee, president of the League Forum; and, as indicated in the letter of transmittal, by several hundred other student and faculty members.

In connection with human need in the State of Alabama, somewhat discussed here the other day, it appears desirable at this time to bring to the attention of the Senate some information generously offered for use here by a tireless friend of man, an indefatigable and exceptionally talented Representative in Congress from the State of Alabama. I refer to Hon. GEORGE HUDDLESTON.

Representative HUDDLESTON, on December 8, 1931, introduced a bill calling for the appropriation of $100,000,000 for the relief of persons residing in the United States who may be in need of the necessaries of life. His bill provides that the President should have authority to use and employ such agencies as he might create to cooperate with organizations, States, counties, and municipalities upon such terms and conditions as he may deem best.

Evidently, in introducing the measure, there were no questions in Mr. HUDDLESTON's mind with respect to invasion of the State's functions in safeguarding Federal funds contributed to the States from Washington.

Mr. HUDDLESTON has been good enough to permit the use here of letters received by him from residents of the State of Alabama.

He added in conversation the following among other statements of fact: He said in substance that family relief in Birmingham is now administered by the local chapter of the Red Cross. Funds are received from the community chest. There is no help from the National Red Cross. Last month the relief spent was about $62,000 for approximately 50,000 persons, representing an average of $1.20 per person for the month. In addition to the 50,000 who are now being fed in Birmingham, it is his judgment that there are approximately 25,000 more persons who are not receiving enough food for their health requirements.

Representative HUDDLESTON directed special attention to a letter of Mr. Howze, chairman of the local unit of the Red Cross. The only reservation he placed on the use of these letters was that, with the exception of the letter from Mr. Howze, the names of the signers, some of whom are unfortunate, be withheld.

I shall read extracts from but a few of these letters. Mr. Howze, of the Jefferson County Chapter of the American Red Cross, says in part:

We have Jefferson County divided into districts, and have a regular case worker investigating complaints in the Johns and Adger districts, where many are unemployed and where the demands on us are heavy.

* * * * * * *

In reply to a request from Senator BLACK as to our needs, I wrote him we would like to have about 9,000 packages of assorted garden seeds, and if you can assist him in any way in obtaining them for us I will appreciate it very much. Last year the National Red Cross gave us about 5,000 packages, which they purchased out of the drought-relief funds, but I do not believe they have any money available this year for these seeds; and it is possible you and Senator BLACK may be able to add an amendment to some bill authorizing the Government to distribute them. We have had such a mild winter that thousands are ready to begin planting their gardens, and the earlier we get the seed the better.

Another letter, the name of the signer of which I shall not read, says under date of January 7, 1932:

I was reading in the Birmingham Post that you told the Senate Unemployment Relief Committee that thousands of men, women, and children were suffering because of unemployment conditions in Birmingham, and that the situation here was "filled with dynamite."

And then I see where Harry J. Early, director of the Birmingham Community Chest, said—

The Senator from Alabama [Mr. BLACK], I am advised, read a telegram from him the other day.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. COSTIGAN. Certainly.

Mr. BLACK. The telegram I read was from Mr. Mervin Sterne, the gentleman who conducted the community chest drive.

Mr. COSTIGAN. Then my statement is erroneous and the suggestion is withdrawn.

Mr. BLACK. It is a very full statement, to which I will call the Senator's attention, of the number of unemployed and the increasing burden on the Red Cross and the community chest there.

Mr. COSTIGAN. The letter referring to Mr. Early continues—

That he believed you had been misinformed as to the conditions in Birmingham, and that this misinformation had led to your statement that there is suffering in Birmingham because of unemployment.

Now, what I wish to say is that I am sure you were far more correct in your estimation of the unemployment conditions here in Birmingham than Mr. Early. Although Mr. Early is supposed to be thrown in close contact with the unemployment situation here, I sincerely believe that if a thorough investigation was made of the unemployment situation, you would find it in great need of immediate attention. Mr. Early, I believe, is only thrown with the laboring class, which is cared for by the community chest when out of employment. But there is a class of people who are suffering beyond any estimation, and are not getting any help because they have pride and self-respect, and will starve and suffer before they will call on charity for help. That class is the middle class, or white-collar class, the stenographer, the bookkeeper, the mechanic, etc., and these are the small-home owners who, when they had jobs, saved their money and invested it in small shares of what they thought to be sound stock, and put their money in building and loan associations, thinking that this was the proper way to save and increase their savings; and then these hard times came around, and they saw their stocks dwindle down to nothing and the building and loan associations refuse to let them have their money, and seeing the mortgages on their homes come due, and they not having enough money to pay the interest on the mortgage in order to renew it. These are the people who are really suffering because of unemployment; these are the people who are the "backbone of the Nation," and, if given jobs with a living wage, will do more to put the country back to normal times than any other one thing, because they will then begin to buy what they want and need, hire helpers, etc., and gradually put the country back to normal times. These people have stood just about all they can; and if relief doesn't come real soon, I can not help but believe there will be chaos. If you should be able to get this class of miserable but worthy people relief, you will be rendering your country the greatest service possible.

Another letter addressed to Representative HUDDLESTON says:

I have never asked a favor of any of my friends in Washington, D. C., but I am going to ask one of you. I have been cut off my job since July 15, 1930, lost everything I had, and have a wife and three children. Can't find or get anything to do. I am asking you to help me get something with the Government. I am a lumber inspector; know all grades of southern yellow pine and hardwood; handled mostly railroad material. I can do office work, or work men. Can furnish best of references. I am 43 years old. Will appreciate anything you can do, as I must have something to do. I can't let my family starve.

This letter is typical of other letters here, received by Representative HUDDLESTON.

Another letter to Mr. HUDDLESTON, from Birmingham, Ala., dated January 9, 1932, contains the following statements:

After reading your speech in the House of Representatives entitled, "No American Should be Allowed to Starve"; also your testimony to Manufactures Committee, I feel that you have stated the facts very mildly in both cases, and that there is no exaggeration on your part. I have also noticed the contradiction offered by Mr. Early and others.

I honestly believe that the general majority of people in your district are firmly behind your conviction and that they will uphold you in the future as they have done in the past.

The critical situation of unemployment, lack of proper and sufficient food and clothing, in conjunction with the scant supply of fuel in many cases, making people in general subject to disease to themselves and others, especially undernourishment of children by proper food, causes any honest citizen to resent the propaganda mongers, who delight to contradict you in your honest efforts to serve the common people.

Find inclosed a paper clipping concerning a pathetic case. Thousands of others would be in the same predicament if they were confronted with the same unfortunate and sad affair.

In closing I will state that I have been a resident of Jefferson County for 17 years. I am a voter and taxpayer, a Free Mason, and an ex-soldier. My four children, ranging in age from 18 to 25, have been educated in the schools of Jefferson County, business colleges of Birmingham, and in one case University of Alabama. I have been and I am now a wage earner. Therefore, I know the needs of the common people.

I hope you will find strength and courage to continue your fight for principles that are dear to real Americans.

Without reading further from the many letters before me, I shall conclude these references to Alabama by calling attention to a resolution adopted at Bessemer, Ala., according to information reaching me, at the county courthouse, on February 6, 1932. The resolution, as transmitted, is this:

BESSEMER, ALA., February 6, 1932.

At a mass meeting held on the above date, attended by an audience of about 500, called for the purpose of discussing the unemployment situation in the country as a whole, and particularly in the Bessemer district, the following resolution was unanimously adopted at this meeting:

"Whereas there now exists in the United States an unparalleled unemployment situation; and

"Whereas at this time there is less than 15 per cent of the normal pay roll of Jefferson County employed, and particularly is this true in the Bessemer cut-off, where practically all of the plants, shops, furnaces, and mines are practically closed down, and have been for the last past year; and

"Whereas a conservative estimate made by people who are directly affected shows approximately between thirty-five and fifty thousand wage earners are now unemployed in Jefferson County, this not including the small business men and their employees, who are directly affected by this unemployment situation; and

"Whereas the Red Cross and charitable organizations of Jefferson County have done much to relieve the suffering brought about as a direct result of this unemployment situation, and in some instances the employers have contributed liberally to the maintenance of their employees and their families, and for all of this we are greatly appreciative; but, notwithstanding the response from these various sources, the Bessemer district is at this time facing a grave situation, and many families are destitute, and this condition is increasing daily; and

"Whereas our Federal Government in the past has seen fit to relieve the flood sufferers and other unfortunate conditions in our country; and

"Whereas our Government has recently seen fit to appropriate large sums of money for the use and benefit of defunct banks and like financial interests in our country, but our Government has failed to realize and appreciate the unemployment condition and the suffering of the wage earners and the producers of our national wealth; and

"Whereas there is now pending in Congress a bill known as the La Follette-Costigan bill, and in principle and purpose we believe would go far toward relieving the present destitution and suffering of the working people as well as the great masses:

"Therefore we unhesitatingly indorse said bill, and we further ask all of our Government officers, including State, county, and municipal, to support and use their influence to persuade our Senators and Congressmen to vote for and support said measure. And we further appreciate the loyal and patriotic stand that our Congressman, GEORGE HUDDLESTON, has taken by supporting this bill: Be it further

Resolved, That a copy of the resolution be forwarded to our Senators, namely, HUGO BLACK and JOHN BANKHEAD, and also to our Congressman, GEORGE HUDDLESTON, and that a copy also be furnished the press.

Mr. President, there is practically nothing I now desire to add to this discussion, except to direct attention to legislation heretofore enacted by the Congress to which it has not been customary to raise technical objections on this floor.

Some days ago I drew attention to the so-called emergency appropriation for special study and demonstration work in rural sanitation, Senate bill 1234, which passed this body some days ago without the slightest comment or criticism. It is unnecessary to elaborate that discussion, but lest there be doubt as to the history of this bill and preceding similar bills, perhaps it is well to refer to part of that history.

In the Seventieth Congress, the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY] gave notice, on February 26, 1929, that he was going to move to suspend the rules for the purpose of proposing, in the second deficiency appropriation bill for the fiscal years ending June 30, 1929, and June 30, 1930, that a supplemental appropriation of $130,500 be provided for the Public Health Service. On February 28, 1929, he offered an amendment to the second deficiency appropriation bill, reading as follows:

Studies in rural sanitation: For an additional amount for studies in rural sanitation, including the same objects specified under this head in the act making appropriations for the Treasury Department for the fiscal year 1930, $130,500.

He explained that this amount, over and above the regular appropriation, was needed for rural sanitation in the seven States inundated by floods of 1927 and 1928. The Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] objected, that they had their regular appropriation for the current and next fiscal year, but the Senator from Kentucky insisted that it would mean disbanding the organization then functioning in the Mississippi Valley unless they could have this additional appropriation now and going on after July 1, 1929. The following debate ensued:

Mr. SMOOT. Am I to understand the Senator to mean that the organization is going to be continued right along because of the fact that there was a flood in some of the Southern States?

Mr. BARKLEY. No; not at all. The health departments of the States which are asking for this appropriation do not expect that. They had hoped to be able to recommend a reduction of 50 per cent in the appropriation, but the recurrence of another flood in 1928 caused the various counties, which are putting up one-half of the necessary amount to bring about a rehabilitation of healthy conditions, to lose a second crop and, as testified by various county judges and State boards of health, they are absolutely unable to assume the burden of the work in view of the disorganized economic condition. If the appropriation is denied, the work will have to be begun at the beginning again, and that, of course, is not desirable.

The amendment of the Senator from Kentucky was agreed to on February 28, 1929.

In the Seventy-first Congress a separate bill (S. 5440) to authorize an emergency appropriation for special study of and demonstration work in rural sanitation, was introduced by the senior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] on December 18, 1930. It was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, and reported with amendments on January 22, 1931. On the same day the bill was reported the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY] offered the following amendment to the first deficiency appropriation bill, then under consideration:

There is hereby appropriated to the Treasury Department for the Public Health Service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1931, any unexpended balance of which shall be available for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1932, for cooperation with State health departments in rural sanitation, including medicines, biological products, personal and medical services, the sum of $3,000,000.

The Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES] made a point of order against the amendment. The Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY] argued that it was not subject to a point of order. Some discussion followed.

Both the chairman of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, the Senator from Oregon [Mr. MCNARY] who had been absent from the hearing, and the acting chairman, the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. HATFIELD], stated that this was not the action of the committee, and the Senator from Kentucky also admitted that that was not the case. The amendment would then have gone out on a point of order but, after appeals by the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY] and by the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. Caraway], who urged that an epidemic of pellagra and typhoid fever was already breaking out in the drought-infected areas, the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES] withdrew his point of order, and the amendment was adopted by the Senate.

The conference committee reduced the amount to $2,000,000 and changed the wording to read:

For special studies of and demonstration work in, rural sanitation, including the purchase and distribution of medical supplies, in the drought-stricken areas, and including personal services, fiscal years 1931 and 1932, $2,000,000: Provided, That no part of this appropriation shall be available for demonstration work in rural sanitation unless the State, county, or municipality affected agrees to pay such proportion of the expenses of such demonstration work, as shall be required in regulations to be prescribed by the Public Health Service, in which due consideration shall be given to State and local economic conditions and human needs, the extent and circumstances of such cooperation in each case to be reported to Congress at the beginning of each regular session (first deficiency act, February 6, 1931, vol. 46, p. 1074).

Later in the session, when Senate bill 5444 was reached on the calendar and it was moved to indefinitely postpone it since it had been incorporated in an appropriation bill, the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] objected and stated that he preferred to have the bill just go over in the usual way.

In the Seventy-second Congress a like bill was again introduced by the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] on December 10, 1931, Senate bill 1234, and was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry. After hearings, the bill was reported with amendments on January 20, 1932. When the bill was reached on calendar day January 25, 1932, the committee amendments, striking out "in the drought-stricken areas of 1930," and other words made necessary by this amendment, were adopted by the Senate, and the bill passed.

Mr. President, indicative of the attitude of Members of the Senate in regard to legislation, except with respect to the relief of human needs, it now appears proper to direct attention to the language included in the act approved July 11, 1916, with reference to the expenditure of Federal funds in connection with State road building. Section 6 of that act contains this language:

SEC. 6. That any State desiring to avail itself of the benefits of this act shall, by its State highway department, submit to the Secretary of Agriculture project statements setting forth proposed construction of any rural post road or roads therein. If the Secretary of Agriculture approve a project, the State highway department shall furnish to him such surveys, plans, specifications, and estimates therefor as he may require: Provided, however, That the Secretary of Agriculture shall approve only such projects as may be substantial in character and the expenditure of funds hereby authorized shall be applied only to such improvements. Items included for engineering, inspection, and unforeseen contingencies shall not exceed 10 per cent of the total estimated cost of the work. If the Secretary of Agriculture approve the plans, specifications, and estimates, he shall notify the State highway department and immediately certify the fact to the Secretary of the Treasury. The Secretary of the Treasury shall thereupon set aside the share of the United States payable under this act on account of such project, which shall not exceed 50 per cent of the total estimated cost thereof. No payment of any money apportioned under this act shall be made on any project until such statement of the project, and the plans, specifications, and estimates therefor, shall have been submitted to and approved by the Secretary of Agriculture.

Apparently it is not customary in this body to assail provisions of this sort, reasonably designed to safeguard Federal expenditures, as tyrannical and subverting established and proper relations between the States and the Federal Government. We find here new protests against reasonable precautions for the protection of public funds expended for national purposes.

Mild, indeed, are the provisions for Federal control in the pending bill when compared with the provisions of the Federal act relating to the construction of public roads. The safeguards in the pending bill are careful, but in no sense do they invade the sovereignty of any State.

Mr. President, I shall conclude by asking permission to have printed in the RECORD certain information and comments on State and Federal cooperation in regard to public health, and the effective relation thereto from time to time of the Children's Bureau of the Department of Labor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. FESS in the chair). Without objection, it is so ordered.

The information and comments are as follows:

Committee B of section 1, medical service, of the White House Conference on Child Health and Protection, dealing with prenatal and maternal care, was under the chairmanship of Dr. Fred L. Adair, professor of obstetrics and gynecology, University of Chicago. In the Addresses and Abstracts of Committee Reports, published by the White House conference, page 89, appears the following statement by Doctor Adair:

"The interest and zeal of the Children's Bureau of the Department of Labor and the Census Bureau have been of invaluable aid in the collection and correlation of statistical data on factors causing maternal mortality. The Children's Bureau has given valuable service in the direction of the administration of the Federal maternity and infancy act and in other demonstrations, in addition to the publication of many bulletins of educational and practical value dealing with maternal and infant and child welfare.

"The practical results of the maternity and infancy act are impossible to evaluate, but it is significant that all but three of the State bureaus of child hygiene cooperated fully in carrying out the demonstrations. Most of them are continuing maternal and child welfare work. Through the continued cooperation of the State bureaus of child hygiene much valuable work may be done and information secured."

Excerpt from official proceedings of the White House Conference on Child Health and Protection, Washington, D. C., November 22, 1930, page 46:

"Whereas the studies of infant mortality made by the Children's Bureau and by others show that infant mortality is greatly influenced by the factors of education, income, and general living standards of families; and

"Whereas effective measures to reduce infant mortality and to promote child health must take into account these and related factors; and

"Whereas the Children's Bureau has from its beginning conducted its studies and based its constructive activities with relation to all phases of child life and all the factors influencing it: Therefore, be it

"Resolved, That it is the sense of this committee on dependency and neglect of the White House Conference on Child Health and Protection of 1930 that the present statutory provisions as to the function of the Children's Bureau and its present staff and operation should continue intact."

Excerpts from hearing on Child Welfare Extension Service before the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, House of Representatives, January 20, 21, and 22, 1931:

"It has been reported to the National League of Women Voters that prompt resumption of the maternity and infancy work under the Children's Bureau has been asked to meet the immediate need, for it is urged by many prominent doctors and others who are familiar with the situation.

"Among the doctors are: Drs. Walter Fischel, Medical School, Washington University, St. Louis; George H. Crooker, Providence, R. I.; Charles Bardeen, dean Wisconsin State Medical School; Dorothy Reed Mendenhall, president Madison (Wis.) Child Welfare Clinic; Charlotte Calvert, Wisconsin State Board of Health, director of maternity and child hygiene; Wells P. Eagleton, Newark, N. J.; Charles S. Bacon, Chicago (Ill.) obstetrician; Fred Adair, University of Chicago; James Steward, Missouri State health commissioner; Virgil C. McCarthy, Kansas City, Mo.; John Rowley, Hartford, Conn.; John E. Gonce, professor of pediatrics, Wisconsin State Medical School; C. F. Kendall, health commissioner of Maine; Graeme Mitchell, director of the research department, Children's Hospital, Cincinnati; Julius Hess, Chicago; Ellery Reed, director Trounstine Research Foundation, Cincinnati; Richard C. Small, Portland, Me.; Harry E. Davis, Portland, Me.; John Davis, Portland, Me.; Earle Hall, Portland, Me.; Harriet B. Jones, West Virginia; Ella V. Dodge, Chicago, Ill.; Allison Hodges, president Medical Society of Virginia; Greer Baughman, chairman of maternity and infancy of the Medical Society of Virginia; W. T. Lindsay, president Madison (Wis.) Public Welfare Association; C. W. Harper, president Wisconsin State Board of Health.

"Support is also given by Mary S. Gardner, Providence, R. I., internationally known authority on public-health nursing; Mayor Robbins, Norwich, Conn.; State Nurses' Association, Michigan; Michigan Parent-Teachers Association; 17 officers of organizations in West Virginia; Women's Missionary Council of Methodist Church South, with constituency of 200,000 women." Page 31, from statement of Dr. A. T. McCormack, secretary State board of health, Louisville, Ky.:

"The passage of the Sheppard-Towner Act in the final form in which it was approved by this Congress has proven its value. In no other respect has it so definitely proven as by the evidence it has built up in every State in the Union as to the necessity for such full-time local health organizations for the effective development of maternity and infancy program, which should at the same time educate all the people in all problems of public health.

"Those who oppose this legislation speak both loud and long about the terrible results that are to develop from its enactment. I challenge any one of them to take from the reports of the Surgeon General of the United States Public Health Service or of the Children's Bureau or of the Agricultural Department, in the development of its 4-H clubs any Federal action which has invaded the rights of any State, any State action that has overridden the wishes of any community. Clothed in the imponderability and complexity of constitutional argument they would prevent all human progress. Every bit of evidence presented against the original Sheppard-Towner Act before this committee will be reproduced to-day, idea for idea, word for word, thought for thought, and no justifiable complaint against any of its operations or that of the division of rural sanitation of the United States Public Health Service will be brought to your attention. Full-time county health departments have been developed slowly since the first ones were established in Kentucky and Washington in 1908. Enough have been developed and maintained over periods of years to make it apparent to any student of the subject that they must become a part of the warp and woof of our Federal, State, and local government. The Sheppard-Towner law was in existence for seven years. I challenge those who oppose the enactment of this bill into law to show where the rights or immunities of any State or individual have in the slightest degree been abridged during this period of development."

Resolution adopted at the forty-fifth annual meeting of the State and Provincial Health Authorities of North America, held in Washington, D. C., June 18, 19, 20, 1930

Whereas it is recognized by public health administrators that local public health work, which brings it into important contact with the people in their homes, whether in the city, suburban, agricultural, or industrial districts, is essential to public welfare; and

Whereas demonstrations in practically every State have definitely proven the value of the county, district, or parish unit in public health work, and that such units can best be developed by proper cooperation between the local, State, and Federal Governments, which should jointly finance and standardize them while maintaining State and local control of their personnel; and

Whereas the maternal and infant health work conducted by the States, in cooperation with the United States Children's Bureau, has demonstrated the importance of this work so that it must be maintained during the transition while county and district health departments are being organized and developed in the United States under the plan wisely formulated by the United States Public Health Service in cooperation with this organization: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Conference of State and Provincial Health Authorities of North America, That we approve the Cooper bill, H. R. 12995, in principle and express our gratitude to the President of the United States for his enlightened leadership in making it a part of the program of the administration, and that he petition the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States to carefully consider this measure, with a view to perfecting it and adopting it at the next session of Congress as the most important step for relieving the burden of the agricultural population of the United States—the protection of their health and lives.

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator a question before he takes his seat.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Kentucky?

Mr. COSTIGAN. With pleasure.

Mr. LOGAN. The Senator has doubtless noticed in the press that the President has set up an organization to bring money from hiding, and it is said they are going to make a house-to-house canvass. I suppose they are going to "doodle bug" the money out in some way, and I have been wondering if the Senator from Colorado had given consideration to that matter and whether he does not think we may not need to pass the pending bill if they get the money in that way?

Mr. COSTIGAN. Mr. President, the question of the Senator from Kentucky is evidence that the subject will be well taken care of by him and others.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Ninety Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present.

Mr. HEBERT. Mr. President, in the consideration of the measure now pending before the Senate I have been interested to observe some of the responses which were made to the inquiry propounded by the chairman of the Committee on Manufactures [Mr. LA FOLLETTE], particularly as they referred to conditions in my own State. There are in Rhode Island 39 cities and towns. I assume the committee transmitted its inquiries to the mayors and to the chief executives of all those municipalities in Rhode Island.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Rhode Island yield to the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. HEBERT. Certainly.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. In the first place, may I say to the Senator from Rhode Island, that the questionnaire was not sent out by the committee. It was sent out by me prior to the meeting of Congress and before the committee took up the question. The census list of all incorporated villages, towns, and cities was addressed. These are the replies which have come from that general list.

Mr. HEBERT. Then, Mr. President, it follows that every town and city in our State received one of the questionnaires, because they are all incorporated municipalities.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. That is correct.

Mr. HEBERT. I note that but two replies came back from Rhode Island in answer to those inquiries—one from the mayor of the city of Pawtucket, a city of 80,000 population, and the other from the mayor of the city of Providence, the capital of the State. In the case of the 37 remaining cities and towns, inasmuch as no responses were made, it is fair to assume that they do not need Federal aid to care for their dependents. The response which came from Pawtucket indicated that there was no need in that city for Federal relief. The response from Providence was quite to the contrary. I am at a loss to understand the attitude of the mayor of the city of Providence as disclosed in his answer to the questionnaire, having in mind what has already been done in our State to relieve unemployment and what had already been done at the time the questionnaire was directed to the mayors and chief executives of our cities and towns.

In the latter part of 1931 the subject of relief of unemployment received the very serious attention of our welfare organizations and of those interested in the affairs of the government of our State and its municipalities. Some time in the month of October the governor of our State received an inquiry from the relief committee appointed by the President of the United States desiring to be informed as to whether or not Rhode Island would be able to provide relief for unemployment and distress during the coming winter. The governor replied, in effect, that Rhode Island would take care of its own.

Subsequently, in the month of November last, he called a special session of the legislature of our State to consider the subject of unemployment. The legislature met for one day and during that session enacted a law to provide for unemployment relief, for the creation of a relief commission, to provide that cities and towns might borrow money for unemployment relief and issue notes, to provide for the distribution and administration of said relief, and making appropriations therefor. That act made an appropriation of $1,500,000. It provides that any city or town in the State may borrow from the State up to one-tenth of 1 per cent of its taxed valuation of real and personal property. Many of our municipalities have availed themselves of the provisions of the act. They may borrow this money at the rate of 3 per cent.

The city of Providence until recently had not availed itself of the provisions of the law enacted for this relief, but I have been informed recently that it is now in a way to do so. It occurred to me that the nature of this legislation is such that it might be informative to the Senate, and I ask that the act may be reproduced in the RECORD in full as a part of my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The act referred to is as follows:

STATE OF RHODE ISLAND AND PROVIDENCE PLANTATIONS,
Special Session, November, 1931.

Creating an unemployment relief commission and defining its powers and duties; authorizing the several cities and towns to borrow money for unemployment relief and issue notes therefor; providing for the distribution and administration of said relief; and making appropriations to purchase said notes and for the expenses of said commission

It is enacted by the general assembly as follows:

SECTION 1. Whenever used in this act, unless the context otherwise requires—

(a) "Town" includes city.

(b) "Town council" includes board of aldermen and the city council in the city of Cranston.

(c) "Commission" means the State unemployment relief commission hereinafter created.

(d) "Notes" include promissory notes, debentures, bonds, and such other promises to pay and/or acknowledgments or evidences of indebtedness as said commission may authorize any town to issue in accordance with this act.

(e) "Public works" includes State as well as town public works, and also hospitals and educational institutions supported wholly or in part by State or town appropriations, and such other activities of a public nature as may be approved by said commission.

SEC. 2. There is hereby created a commission to be known as the State unemployment relief commission, to consist of the bank commissioner, who shall act as chairman of said commission, the chairman of the board of tax commissioners, and the general treasurer, each acting ex officio. The members of said commission shall serve without pay as such, but said commission may employ such assistants, fix their duties and compensation, and expend such sums for office expense, printing, binding, and advertising and traveling expense and equipment as it deems necessary within the amount appropriated therefor. The statehouse commission shall furnish said commission with suitable offices and telephone service in the statehouse or State office building for the transaction of its business.

SEC. 3. Clause 1. In addition to the existing powers of towns to borrow money, the town council of any town may from time to time until April 1, 1933, with the written consent of said commission, borrow money for expenditure in accordance with the provisions of this act and issue the notes of said town therefor. Said notes shall be renewable from time to time, with the consent of said commission, upon the application of said town council; but the time of payment shall not be extended beyond June 30, 1933: Provided, That the aggregate amount of said notes outstanding at any one time shall not exceed one-tenth of 1 per cent of the total taxable property of said town as reported to the board of tax commissioners as of June 15, 1931. Said notes shall be obligatory on said town in the same manner and to the same extent as other debts lawfully contracted by said town, but shall be excepted from the operation of section 22 of chapter 47 of the general laws as amended.

Clause 2. The sum of $1,500,000 is hereby appropriated out of any money in the treasury not otherwise appropriated for the purchase of said notes, and when authorized by said commission the State comptroller shall draw his orders upon the general treasurer for such sums as may be from time to time required for said purpose within the amount appropriated therefor.

Clause 3. Said notes shall be of such denominations, payable at such times as said commission shall prescribe, but not later than June 30, 1933, and bear interest at the rate of 3 per cent per annum, payable quarterly, by the town issuing said notes out of its own funds. Said notes shall, under such regulations as said commission may prescribe, be callable at par by the town council at any interest date upon 10 days' notice to the general treasurer.

Clause 4. Said commission shall approve said notes as to form and substance. Said notes shall be signed by the president of the town council, or some other member of said town council authorized so to do by said town council, and the town treasurer.

Clause 5. The general treasurer shall set up a special relief account for each town. Said notes, when purchased by the State, shall be turned over to the general treasurer and the proceeds shall be retained by the general treasurer in the special relief account for said town to be withdrawn as hereinafter provided.

Clause 6. The general treasurer shall deposit, subject to his order, all moneys received by him under this act, in such safe and responsible banks and trust companies, located within this State, having a paid-in capital stock of at least $500,000, as will give the highest rate of interest therefor.

SEC. 4. The director of public aid in each town shall, in accordance with the provisions of this act, the rules and regulations made thereunder and the estimate provided for in section 8 of this act, disburse the funds made available by this act in his town, and he may, subject to the approval of the town council of his town, employ such assistants and incur such administrative expenses as may be necessary to an amount not exceeding 3 per cent of the estimate required by section 8 of this act, as approved by said commission for the period in which said amount is to be expended. Said director shall promptly furnish his town council and said commission with such information relative to the administration of this act in his town as they may require of him. The directors of public aid may, with the approval of said commission, delegate to their assistants the performance of any duty imposed or the exercise of any power conferred upon said directors by this act, or any lawful rule or regulation made thereunder.

SEC. 5. Within 10 days after the passage of this act, and whenever thereafter required by his town council, the director of public aid for each town shall in writing and in the form required by said commission furnish his town council with a detailed program of public works upon which he proposes to employ the persons in his town granted, or to be granted, relief under this act, giving a schedule of hours, wages, and such other information as said commission or his own council may require. After the town council has approved said program as submitted, or as amended by it, said town council shall forward the same to said commission for its approval, and after said commission has approved said program as forwarded to it or as amended by it, said director shall grant no relief under this act to any person except for services actually performed on such approved public works unless he and the president of the town council shall certify to the town treasurer, in such form as said commission may prescribe, that no such employment is available for such program. Said program may be amended at any time by said commission or by the director of public aid with the consent of the town council and said commission.

SEC. 6. Whenever any person, who has lived at least two years in the State and at least six months in the town in which he applies, shall in writing and under oath, on a form prescribed by said commission, and containing such information as said commission may require, apply to the director of public aid of said town, stating that he is able and willing to work but can not obtain employment, and that he or those or some of those solely and legally dependent upon him for support are suffering or are about to suffer from the lack of the necessities of life on account of his said lack of employment, said director shall, after such investigation as said commission may by rule require, and such other investigation as he deems necessary, if he is satisfied that such statement is true, (a) furnish him with employment on the approved public works in accordance with the rules and regulations of said commission and pay him from the funds received from the general treasurer as provided in section 8 of this act at whatever rate per week may be fixed from time to time by said commission, but in no case to exceed $15 for a week of such hours as may be fixed by said commission; (b) if, however, no such work is available for the applicant, said director shall, under such rules and regulations as said commission may prescribe, upon certifying that fact to the town treasurer as provided in section 5 of this act, and in accordance with the rules and regulations of said commission, furnish such applicant with such food, fuel, clothing, and other necessities as will keep him and those solely and legally dependent upon him for support from suffering, at a rate to be fixed by said director, but not exceeding $1 per day for such applicant and 50 cents per day for each person solely and legally dependent upon him for support, and not exceeding $15 per week for any one family, and pay for said necessities out of the funds received from the general treasurer as provided in section 8 of this act.

SEC. 7. Each director of public aid shall endeavor at all times to obtain private employment for the unemployed persons in his town, and shall furnish no relief under this act to any person who, he is satisfied, is able but unwilling to work, or who refuses without good and sufficient reason to do any public or private work offered to him.

SEC. 8. Each director of public aid shall furnish his town council with his estimate in duplicate, and in such form as may be required by said town council, of the amount required for the next period fixed by said commission for the relief of the unemployed of the town; and when said town council has approved said estimate as made or as amended by it said town council shall forward same to said commission for its approval, and after said commission has approved said estimate as forwarded to it or as amended by it said commission shall certify the same to the State comptroller, who shall draw his order upon the general treasurer for the payment to the treasurer of said town of the amount so approved and certified by said commission, and the general treasurer shall charge the same to the special-relief account of said town, and said town treasurer shall pay out the same upon proper vouchers approved by the director of public aid.

SEC. 9. With the approval of his town council, the director of public aid may, in accordance with the rules and regulations prescribed by said commission, include in his estimate, provided for in section 8 of this act, such sums as he deems necessary for materials and facilities for use in connection with his program of approved public works upon which the unemployed of his town are or are to be employed.

SEC. 10. Authority is hereby given to said commission, in addition to the authority hereinbefore given to it, to make from time to time all needful general and special rules and regulations to carry out the provisions and purposes of this act.

SEC. 11. The members of said commission, for the purpose of ascertaining whether a town is properly administering this act, are hereby authorized personally, or by their assistants thereunto authorized by said commission, to examine any books, papers, records, or memoranda bearing upon the administration of this act in said town, and may require the attendance of any officer or employee of said town having knowledge in the premises and may take his testimony with reference to the same, with power to administer oaths to said person or persons; and the superior court for the county in which such officer or employee resides shall have jurisdiction by appropriate process to compel such attendance, testimony, or production of books, papers, records, or memoranda.

SEC. 12. The members of said commission, its employees, the several directors of public aid, and their respective assistants are hereby authorized to administer any oath provided for by this act or by any lawful rule or regulation made thereunder.

SEC. 13. Any person who knowingly makes a false statement in any form, application, return, or other paper herein referred to, or provided for in any lawful rule or regulation made by said commission, or willfully obtains or attempts to obtain in any manner for himself or another, or grants, furnishes, uses, or attempts to grant, furnish, or use otherwise than authorized in this act, or by the lawful rules and regulations made thereunder, any relief of any kind provided for under this act, or who fills or uses any food order or order for other necessities issued by a director of public aid otherwise than in accordance with its directions and the provisions of this act and the lawful rules and regulations made thereunder, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and in addition to other penalties provided by law shall be fined not more than $1,000 or imprisoned for not more than one year, or both, in the discretion of the court.

SEC. 14. Every town officer or employee, whether elected or appointed, shall cooperate with said commission in making effective the provisions of this act in his town, and any such officer or employee failing to so cooperate shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and upon conviction shall be fined not more than $1,000 or imprisoned for not more than one year, or both, in the discretion of the court.

SEC. 15. No work done by any town under this act upon any way or street shall constitute or be any evidence of an acceptance of such way or street by said town, nor shall it in any way change the status of said way or street. Likewise no work done upon any way or street under this act shall constitute or be any evidence of an acceptance of said way or street by the State board of public roads, nor shall it in any way change the status of said way or street.

SEC. 16. If any provision of this act or of any rule or regulation made thereunder, or the application thereof to any person or circumstances, is held invalid by a court of competent jurisdiction, the remainder of the act, rule, or regulation, and the application of such provision to other persons or circumstances shall not be affected thereby.

SEC. 17. For the purpose of paying for personal services, office expenses, printing, binding and advertising, and traveling expense and equipment, and for carrying this act into effect the sum of $35,000 is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the treasury not otherwise appropriated, to be expended during the period ending June 30, 1933, and the State comptroller is hereby authorized and directed to draw his orders upon the general treasurer for the payment of such sum or so much thereof as may be required upon receipt by him of proper vouchers approved by any two members of said commission.

SEC. 18. This act may be cited or referred to as "The act for the relief of the unemployed," and shall take effect upon its passage.

Mr. HEBERT. Mr. President, I may add that the governor of our State has received many commendatory letters from all parts of the country upon the attitude of our legislature and of the people of Rhode Island in making this provision for relief. It has worked out very satisfactorily, and I am assured that there will be no want of funds in the event that the present appropriation shall be exhausted.

The State of Rhode Island is determined to take care of whatever need may arise within its borders. We shall provide the necessaries of life and we shall do so through our own means. Of course, I am not overlooking the activities of the many excellent charitable organizations that are operating to this end in Rhode Island; they have done a splendid work; I am sure they will continue their efforts; but, if need be, to supplement what the charitable organizations are doing and have done or to supplement what the legislature has done by the appropriation of funds, I think I am justified in saying that we shall not resort to any Federal appropriation for the purpose, but that we shall provide the necessary means to do that which we feel we are called upon to do.

Mr. MORRISON. Mr. President, the two measures—the so-called La Follette-Costigan bill and what we have come to call the Black substitute therefor—while probably they do not in a technical sense legislate for two years, yet under legislative practice and the practices of the Treasury Department they in reality do so. I do not think it wise to enact emergency legislation to cover two years. I am quite sure that if the present emergency is to pass at all it will pass long before that time will have elapsed.

The Black substitute provides that only $125,000,000 of the $375,000,000 provided for loans to the States for the relief of unemployment shall be used during this fiscal year, and a similar restriction is made applicable to the road provision of the substitute. At the proper time I expect to offer amendments which I have prepared looking to the appropriation of $125,000,000 at once for each purpose and to let the future take care of itself. It seems to me that we Democrats ought not to assume that we are going to have two years of depression and unemployment under the Democratic administration, which I confidently expect to see inaugurated next year; and it does seem to me that if we legislate for this year we shall have met our duty, in view of the terrible burdens under which the Treasury now struggles.

Therefore, Mr. President, I am going to offer the amendments to which I have referred to the Black substitute, so that if it shall be adopted there will be provided for immediate use $125,000,000 for each purpose embraced in the measure. I think if we shall do that, we shall have discharged the duty of the Government in the present, and as to the future we can deal with that when the time comes.

The La Follette-Costigan bill is subject to the same objection, as it seems to me, namely, that it proposes to appropriate at once $375,000,000, making only $125,000,000 available at this time and during the present fiscal year. It seems to me to go beyond the latter sum would be utterly unnecessary at this time.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the first committee amendment, which the Secretary will state.

The first amendment of the Committee on Manufactures was, in section 4, page 5, line 20, after the word "apportioned," to insert "or allocated," so as to make the clause read:

(c) The amounts apportioned or allocated to any State under this act shall be available for payment to and expenditure by such State, for the purposes of this act, until the expiration of two years after the date of enactment of this act.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 10, page 10, line 10, after the word "by," to strike out "moneys apportioned to the State," and to insert "any moneys paid or to be paid to the State from the apportionment," so as to make the clause read:

SEC. 10. (a) Whenever, from the statement furnished by the State agency and verified by the board, it appears that the combined moneys available from local and State funds within the State, supplemented by any moneys paid or to be paid to the State from the apportionment on the basis of population, will fall below the estimated needs for emergency relief in any State, the board shall consider the State eligible for allotment of the reserve funds to be allotted to the several States on the basis of need; but no such allocation shall be made to any State unless the board is satisfied that the State or its political subdivisions have made reasonable efforts within their resources to provide for emergency relief expenditures.

The amendment was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] gave notice that he would offer an amendment to this section of the bill.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, I respectfully ask that the amendment proposed by the Senator from Nebraska may be read or that it be printed in the RECORD at this point.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Let the amendment proposed by the Senator from Nebraska be read, if he desires to offer it now.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; I desire to offer the amendment now, and I have already sent it to the clerk's desk.

Mr. COSTIGAN. I inquire if the amendments to the pending bill, which have just been adopted by the Senate, were those submitted by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE]?

The VICE PRESIDENT. They were, being the committee amendments.

Mr. MCNARY. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator will state it.

Mr. MCNARY. With the amendment just agreed to, have all the committee amendments been acted upon?

The VICE PRESIDENT. All the committee amendments have been agreed to. The amendment now pending is that proposed by the Senator from Nebraska, which will be read for the information of the Senate.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. On page 12, after line 14, it is proposed to insert:

TITLE II

SECTION 1. That there is hereby authorized to be appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $375,000,000 (one-third of which shall be immediately available) for the purpose of the construction and reconstruction of highways under the provisions of the act entitled "An act to provide that the United States shall aid the States in the construction of rural post roads, and for other purposes," approved July 11, 1916, as amended and supplemented. Such amount shall be in addition to any amounts heretofore authorized to be appropriated for such purposes, but not more than $125,000,000 thereof shall be expended in the fiscal year ending June 30, 1932.

SEC. 2. The sums appropriated pursuant to the authorization contained in section 1 shall, from time to time, be apportioned by the Secretary of Agriculture among the several States in the manner provided by section 21 of the Federal highway act, as amended, and shall be available for expenditure upon highway projects approved by the Secretary of Agriculture, in the same manner as other funds appropriated for carrying out the provisions of such act; except that no part of such amounts apportioned to any State need be matched by State funds, and except that such amounts may be expended upon highways, streets, or bridges within the limits of municipalities without regard to the limitations contained in the Federal highway act, as amended, upon construction within municipalities. The work on highways shall be done in such manner as to use the maximum amount of human labor consistent with economy, and preference in employment shall be given to the unemployed. When the Secretary of Agriculture finds that any highway project approved by him in any State has been constructed or reconstructed in compliance with the plans and specifications relating thereto, he shall cause to be paid the proper authorities of the State, out of amounts appropriated pursuant to this act, an amount equal to the total cost of such project, and may, in his discretion, from time to time make such payments on such construction or reconstruction as the same progresses; but the total amount so paid to the State shall not exceed the amount apportioned to that State as hereinbefore provided.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I do not intend to take much time of the Senate, but I should like to have more Senators present to vote on the amendment than are now here.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator suggest the absence of a quorum?

Mr. MCNARY. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Cutting	Kean	Schall

The VICE PRESIDENT. Ninety Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS].

The amendment was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question now is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Alabama [Mr. BLACK] in the nature of a substitute.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, on behalf of the Senator from Colorado [Mr. COSTIGAN] and myself, I desire to offer two amendments to the pending bill.

The first one is, on page 8, line 6, after the word "personnel," to insert a semicolon and strike out the words "whose qualifications to administer relief activities shall meet with the approval of the board."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. BINGHAM. May the amendment be stated?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. On page 8 of the bill, line 6, the Senator from Wisconsin proposes to strike out the words "whose qualifications to administer relief activities shall meet with the approval of the board."

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, I rise for the purpose of asking the Senator from Wisconsin to explain the effect of the amendment. It has not been possible to follow it.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. The effect of the amendment is to strike out from section 6 the language on page 8, beginning on line 6, after the word "personnel," as follows:

Whose qualifications to administer relief activities shall meet with the approval of the board.

So that it will read, if the amendment is adopted:

(3) provision for adequate State administrative personnel.

In other words, there is certain information and certain plans which are to be submitted to the board by State authorities desiring to take advantage of the provisions of relief provided in the pending bill. As introduced and reported from the committee, the paragraph concerning State administrative personnel provided that the Federal emergency relief board should have authority to pass upon the qualifications of the administrative personnel suggested by a State in the plan submitted.

The adoption of this amendment, may I say to the Senator from Arkansas and to other Senators, will have the effect of giving the board authority to require the States to submit in their plans provision for adequate State administrative personnel, but will not permit the board to pass upon the question of whether that personnel has qualifications which, in the judgment of the board, are sufficient to meet the necessary requirements of administration.

Have I made myself clear?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I think so. The question that the board will then pass upon, if the amendment is agreed to, will be whether the State proposes to provide adequate personnel?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Adequate State administrative personnel.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE].

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. On the same page I move to strike out, beginning with line 13, paragraph (b), which reads as follows:

(b) The Children's Bureau may, and at the request of the board shall, make such investigations as may be necessary to verify the statements and confirm the plans submitted by the State agency; and when such plans are in conformity with the provisions of this act and reasonably appropriate and adequate to carry out its purposes, they shall be approved by the board, and due notice of such approval shall be given to the State agency.

It is perfectly obvious, I think, from the reading of that language, what it seeks to accomplish.

May I say in connection with both of these amendments—the one just adopted and the one I have now offered—that it is my deliberate judgment that the administrative safeguards which those two amendments provided in the original bill are legitimate, sound safeguards. However, during the course of the debate there has been serious criticism of these two provisions; and, yielding my own judgment to that expressed by other Senators relating to these two provisions, I am now offering these two amendments because they are not vital to the successful administration of the set-up as proposed in the original bill.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President——

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I yield to the Senator from Montana.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I inquire of the Senator from Wisconsin whether, if the motion which he now makes prevails, and subdivision (b) of section 6 is stricken out, the same authority sought there to be conveyed will not be exercised under the provisions of subdivision (c) of section 3, found at the bottom of page 3, as follows:

(c) The Chief of the Children's Bureau in the Department of Labor shall be charged with the administration of this act, subject to the supervision of the board. The Chief of the Children's Bureau—

(1) Shall insure that the conditions under which funds are allocated to the States under this act are complied with, and shall make or cause to be made such studies, investigations, and reports as will promote the efficient administration of this act.

That, it would seem to me, would give exactly the same authority that is given by the portion of the bill which the Senator now seeks to strike out, under which the Children's Bureau makes investigations to verify statements made by the State.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I should be very much interested to have the Senator's interpretation of that language. As I understand it, however, it merely provides that the administrative officer of the board shall have the power to make such studies and investigations as may be necessary in order to carry out the administrative functions under this bill; namely, the allocation of funds and the certification to the Treasury of compliance with the necessary conditions imposed upon a State in order to secure the benefits under the bill. My understanding is that it does not in fact, as the Senator suggests, convey the same authority which is contained in paragraph (b), which I have now moved to strike out, because, as I interpret it, paragraph (b) refers to all of the foregoing provisions concerning the plans and statistics which it is required that a State shall furnish.

If I have not correctly interpreted it, I should be very glad to have the Senator's opinion about it.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I call attention to the provisions of section 7, which provides that—

Within the limits of the apportionment made to any State on the basis of population the board may certify the payment to the State of not more than 40 per cent of the difference between estimated emergency relief expenditures in the State for the calendar year 1929 and the estimated needs of the State for the calendar year 1932 or 1933, as the case may be.

Under the portion of the bill which the Senator now seeks to strike out, it is quite obvious that the Children's Bureau would check up on the statements made by the governor of the State, both as to the amount expended and as to the needs for 1932 and 1933.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Does the Senator contend that that power is conveyed in paragraph (1), on page 3, or that it would be eliminated if the amendment, on page 8, that I have proposed should be adopted?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. It seems to me that it is included in the duties imposed or the authority conveyed by section (1), at the bottom of page 3:

(c) The Chief of the Children's Bureau in the Department of Labor shall be charged with the administration of this act, subject to the supervision of the board. The Chief of the Children's Bureau—

(1) Shall insure that the conditions under which funds are allocated to the States under this act are complied with—

The condition is that certain statements shall be furnished—and shall make or cause to be made such studies, investigations, and reports as will promote the efficient administration of this act.

It would seem to me that that was an expression of just exactly the idea that is conveyed in paragraph (b), which the Senator seeks to excise.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. May I say, in reference to the paragraph on page 3 which the Senator has just read, that what is intended by the authors is to give the administrative officer of the board the opportunity to convey information to the various States as to efficient administrative provisions which have been set up, in order that States operating under this act may have the benefit of such experience and progress and efficient administration as other States have been able to work out.

May I point out to the Senator, as an example, that one of the chief activities, as I understand, of the President's commission under Mr. Gifford has been to disseminate information concerning activities which they found in certain States—to the attention of the authorities in other States, in order that they might have that information and make such of it as they saw fit—and that is what was intended to be done in this case. If the language conveys power to conduct the same type of investigations which was contemplated by paragraph (b), on page 8, then I should be very glad to have the benefit of the Senator's suggestions, in order that the language might convey that power to disseminate information to other States and to make studies and investigations of various plans and administrative set-ups which are being carried on in the various States, and thus help in a way to lift the general efficiency of administrative work of this character.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, I have no purpose, in the criticism I make of any of these provisions, except to provide, if possible, against the building up here of an enormous body of investigators and writers and all manner of people to check up on the statements which are to be made by the various States in order to secure any portion of the fund created by this act. I have no doubt that such activities as the Senator has in mind would be prosecuted under the provisions of the bill found on page 3, but I equally have no doubt that, as it stands now, practically the same line of investigation could be prosecuted as is specifically provided for by the provision on page 8.

I merely rose to say that it would seem to me as though, if we were to guard against the evils which might flow from the provision of the bill on page 8, some further amendment of that on page 3 would seem to be desirable.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Would the situation be remedied, if I may have the benefit of the Senator's judgment, if the word "investigations" in line 21 were stricken out, confining it to studies and reports?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I should think that would improve it very much.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I ask that the pending amendment be disposed of.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE].

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I move to strike out the word "investigations" and the comma on page 3, line 21.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I want to suggest an amendment to the Senator from Wisconsin and ask him to approve it, if he will, on page 7, after the word "act," in line 12, to add a proviso containing these words:

Provided, That in a State where no state-wide board of charities or other organization dealing with state-wide charities exists the amounts allotted to such State shall be distributed by the action of the State board constituted for controlling the financial affairs of such State.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I discussed that amendment with the Senator from Tennessee the other day, and so far as my information goes, while it might be perfectly feasible in the State of Tennessee it would not be applicable in a number of States and would lead to great confusion.

Mr. McKELLAR. Let me make this suggestion: Will the Senator accept the amendment, and if the bill goes to conference it can be worked out in conference without any trouble?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I would like to accommodate the bill to the suggestion of the Senator, but I would not like to incorporate in it a provision which is not generally applicable to other States. As I explained to the Senator, in discussing the matter of his amendment with other Senators, I found that in many States there would be grave doubt as to what board is referred to in the Senator's amendment, that there might be several boards which would fall under the description of the language employed in his amendment, and that great confusion would result.

Mr. COSTIGAN. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I yield.

Mr. COSTIGAN. I may say to the Senator from Tennessee that, in my judgment, his amendment in its present form would be of uncertain application in Colorado.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I confess, Mr. President, that under the terms of the Senator's amendment I believe there would be some confusion in the State of Wisconsin as to what board was referred to in the language used by the Senator, and I found in consulting with other Senators that that would be true as to other States.

Mr. McKELLAR. I will withdraw the request for the moment and see if I can not frame language which will be acceptable.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I will be very glad to consider any proposal the Senator may make.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, will the Senator from Wisconsin yield?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I yield.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. While the Senator is making some excisions in the language of the bill I would like to inquire of him why these extensive powers should be vested in the Chief of the Children's Bureau, and would not the whole purpose be subserved by cutting out all reference in the bill to the Chief of the Children's Bureau and have the powers reposed in the board? The board is authorized to do these things, and, by a provision of the bill to which reference has recently been made, it is provided:

The Chief of the Children's Bureau in the Department of Labor shall be charged with the administration of this act, subject to the supervision of the board.

The board is to consist of the Chief of the Children's Bureau, the Director of Extension Work in the Department of Agriculture, and the Chief of the Vocational Rehabilitation Service of the Federal Board for Vocational Education.

We create various commissions, like the Power Commission, or the Federal Trade Commission, and they are all given administrative powers. Why can not the board in this case take care of the situation?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I may say that there was a twofold purpose in the proposal to create the board suggested under this bill. First, it is to be composed of officials of the Government who have had past experience in the administration of the State aid acts. Therefore it seemed appropriate that advantage should be taken of that experience in administering the provisions of the bill, and, secondly, that it would not require the creation of a separate board, with separate salaries, and, therefore, to some extent, would be a saving.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, let me remark, because the Senator may have misunderstood me, that I make no point of the creation of the board.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I am coming to the second point, if the Senator will permit me.

The Chief of the Children's Bureau was designated as the administrative authority under this bill, for the reason that the Children's Bureau has had a large experience in the administration of legislation that brought the Children's Bureau into close contact with the public-health and welfare agencies of the States which took advantage of the aid offered by the Federal Government under the maternity and infancy act.

While the principle involved in the act itself has been a matter of serious contention in the Congress, so far as I know in the long debate which occurred on that policy there has never been any successful criticism or condemnation of the administrative character of the Children's Bureau's work in that connection. Therefore it seemed to me, as one of the authors of this bill, that where an administrative officer has had that past experience, and had the confidence, in so far as I know, of all of the public-health agencies and the public-welfare agencies of the several States which cooperated in carrying out the maternity and infancy act, we would take a step in the direction of careful, experienced, and successful administration by taking advantage of the experience which the Children's Bureau had under the maternity act.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, I see no reason why that would not all be available, considering that the Chief of the Children's Bureau is to be a member of the board. But the powers given to the Chief of the Children's Bureau go far beyond the field to which the Senator refers.

For instance, on page 4 the Chief of the Children's Bureau is directed to supply information for the guidance of the States in the administration of funds under this act, not that the board shall, but that the Chief of the Children's Bureau shall. Next, "subject to the approval of the board," the Chief of the Children's Bureau "may appoint and fix the compensation of such experts and, subject to the provisions of the civil service laws, appoint, and, in accordance with the classification act of 1923, as amended, fix the compensation of such other officers and employees as are necessary to carry out the provisions of this act."

That is to say, the Chief of the Children's Bureau appoints the officers. Of course, we might say that that is all subject to the approval of the board. That officer not only fixes the compensation but appoints the employees. In subdivision 5 it is provided:

Subject to the approval of the board, may make such expenditures (including expenditures for personal services and rent at the seat of government and elsewhere, and for printing and binding) as are necessary to carry out the provisions of this act.

Really, the Chief of the Children's Bureau becomes the administrator of the fund, we might say.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. That is not my interpretation of the language.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. She or he will be subject to check by the board, but the initiative in the appointment of subordinates, in fixing their compensation, and all that, is put into the hands of the Chief of the Children's Bureau.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Does not the Senator feel that such an administrative procedure will result in much more speedy action than as if the entire responsibility were placed on the board? Yet the Chief of the Children's Bureau, or the administrative officer, under this measure, can not carry out any of these duties unless they meet with the approval of the board.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Yes; but the Chief of the Children's Bureau will report, "I have appointed So-and-so, and fixed his compensation at so-and-so. He has already been appointed." I do not understand from this that previous authorization is to be gotten from the board at all.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. As I would interpret the words "subject to the supervision of the board," the general statement in paragraph (c) on page 3, and "subject to the approval of the board," contained in the subdivisions which follow, my understanding of the language would be that of course the Chief of the Children's Bureau could not proceed until the board had given its approval.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Take the analogy of an ordinary business corporation—a bank. The cashier runs the bank, hires and discharges, and that kind of thing, and of course that is all subject to the control of the board of directors of the bank. But everybody realizes that the board under those circumstances does not interfere unless there is some glaring misconduct on the part of the cashier.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. As I read the language it seems to me that there is a complete check on all the activities of the administrative officer under the provisions of this measure. Furthermore, it seems to me that in all of the efficient administrative set-ups in private business practice, in the interest of efficiency and in the interest of the speedy carrying out of the necessary administrative functions, power is always vested, subject to control, upon some executive officer who has power to act and to proceed with any organization plans, subject at all times to the approval and supervision of the board of directors, in the case of a bank, as in the illustration the Senator used. In other words, it is my own feeling, I will say frankly to the Senator, that if the board should have to attend to all of the administrative details it would result in delay and would not contribute to the efficiency of administrative procedure.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I yield to the Senator from Nebraska for the purpose of offering perfecting amendments which are necessary in view of the adoption of his amendment, because before I make any further remarks upon the subject matter under discussion I desire in so far as practicable to have the original text in its final and perfected form.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, the adoption of the amendment some time ago embracing "Title II" makes it necessary to have some formal amendments to the bill. For instance, at the beginning of the bill the words "Title I" ought to be inserted. I offer that amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Nebraska.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. NORRIS. I have a number of other formal amendments which I think can be agreed to en bloc by unanimous consent. There are many places, perhaps 25 or 30, in the bill where reference is made to "this act." It ought to be "this title." That does not apply wherever the word "act" occurs, but it does apply wherever the two words "this act" occur. There are some places where the text refers to acts of Congress, so the word "act" should not be stricken out unless it occurs in connection with the word "this." I ask unanimous consent that all those changes be made.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, will not the Senator indicate in the text just what the changes are?

Mr. NORRIS. It would take some time to do it. However, if the Senator desires, I will undertake to do so. On page 2 of the bill, line 13, the words appear:

> The board shall have full power of allocation of funds under the provisions of this act.

It ought to read "under the provisions of this title."

In the next line there is another change of the same sort.

Mr. FESS. I think the Senator misunderstood me. I do not want him to bring those minor amendments to the attention of the Senate, but merely to indicate them for the benefit of the clerks at the desk.

Mr. NORRIS. I have a copy of the bill marked for the clerks. If my unanimous-consent request is granted, I shall hand that copy to them.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Nebraska? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. NORRIS. There was an oversight on my part when I offered the amendment, which I wish now to correct. The substitute amendment has been agreed to. I ask unanimous consent that, after the figure "1," in line 7, page 2, the words "of this title" be inserted, so it will read: "Contained in section 1 of this title."

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered. Are there further amendments to the original text?

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from New York?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I yield.

Mr. COPELAND. Would the Senator object, in view of his colloquy with the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH], to modifying somewhat the language in subsection 4, page 4, so as to have it read?—

> After the approval of the board and the fixing of the compensation of such experts, may appoint—

An so forth?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Will the Senator kindly repeat that language?

Mr. COPELAND. In line 3, page 2, change it so as to read:

> After the approval of the board and the fixing of the compensation of such experts, may appoint, subject to the provisions of the civil service laws—

And so forth.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I think the Senator's purpose would be accomplished if we simply strike out "subject to" and insert "after," so it would read:

> After the approval of the board—

And so forth.

Mr. COPELAND. I believe that would be better.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I have no objection to that amendment. I will repeat it for the benefit of the clerks at the desk. On page 4, line 3, after the parenthesis, strike out the words "subject to" and insert "after," so it will read:

> After the approval of the board, may appoint and fix the compensation of such experts—

And so forth.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WAGNER. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from New York?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I yield.

Mr. WAGNER. I would like to call the attention of the Senator to what I think must have been an error in the drafting. On page 5, line 11, the words are:

> By the civil subdivisions thereof or by private contributions.

That is undoubtedly intended to be, "and by private contributions" instead of "or by private contributions."

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. As a matter of fact I think it should read "and/or."

Mr. NORRIS. No; it is all right as it reads now.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. The object sought to be attained is to give a State in the apportionment the benefit of not only the expenditures made by the State or its political subdivisions for relief but also of contributions made to private charitable and welfare organizations.

Mr. WAGNER. Does not the Senator want to have the two sums added together?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. The lump sums should be added together in order to give the States the benefit of all activities which have been undertaken, either public or private, in meeting the burden of relief.

Mr. WAGNER. But as I read it, the apportionment may be two-thirds of either the amount publicly contributed or contributed from private sources, and I understood the purpose to be to add the two sums together.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. The Senator is absolutely correct. To my mind that is what the language means. That was also the opinion of the Legislative Counsel. I would be glad to have the benefit of the Senator's criticism if we have not employed language to carry out the intent of the authors of the bill.

Mr. WAGNER. Perhaps I am mistaken about it, but it seemed to me very obvious that as the paragraph reads now it permits the apportionment to two-thirds of the amounts made available by a State or the subdivisions thereof or by private contributions. I understood that the apportionment was to be made by adding together all the contributions made, both public and private, and then apportioning two-thirds of it.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Correct. It is the device which the authors of the bill claim will stimulate private and public activity within the State, contrary to the charges which have been made against the bill.

Mr. WAGNER. I am in sympathy with the purpose, but I think the word "and" makes it very much clearer.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Would the Senator also contend that it should read?

Payments made in any calendar year out of the amount of the appropriations apportioned to any State on the basis of population shall not be in excess of two-thirds of the amounts appropriated or otherwise made available for such calendar year by the State——

Mr. WAGNER. Now eliminate the word "or," so it will read:

The amounts appropriated or otherwise made available for such calendar year by the State, by the civil subdivisions thereof, and by private contributions—

And so forth.

Then we would add the sums together and the apportionment is referred to the total.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. If the Senator will propose it, so far as I am concerned, I shall be glad to accept the amendment.

Mr. WAGNER. Very well. I offer the following amendment: On page 5, line 10, after the word "State," insert a comma and strike out the word "or," and in line 11, strike out the word "or" after the word "thereof" and insert the word "and," so it will read:

Payments made in any calendar year out of the amount of the appropriations apportioned to any State on the basis of population shall not be in excess of two-thirds of the amounts appropriated or otherwise made available for such calendar year by the State, by the civil subdivisions thereof, and by private contributions from within the State, to be expended for emergency relief as defined in section 12 of this title.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from New York.

The amendment was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Are there further amendments to the original text?

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, I intend to take but a few minutes of the time of the Senate. I think there is some confusion in the minds of many who are interested in the subject with regard to the legislation that is pending. I know for a while there was a general impression that the so-called substitute amendment offered jointly by the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH], the Senator from Alabama [Mr. BLACK], and the Senator from Ohio [Mr. BULKLEY] was destructive of the purpose of the original bill, known as the La Follette-Costigan bill. Certainly the proponents of the substitute had no such intention, because I believe I can say without fear of successful challenge that there are no Senators in this body who are more sympathetic with those in distress in our country than are those Senators.

The La Follette-Costigan bill proposes to appropriate $375,000,000 to be expended to meet distress in the country. The substitute appropriates $375,000,000 for exactly the same purpose. In addition, the substitute contains a further appropriation of an additional $375,000,000 to provide road work, making $750,000,000 for the relief of distress in the United States. The La Follette-Costigan bill did not contain the provision with regard to employment through the expenditure of $375,000,000 for road construction. It is true the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] offered such a provision in his amendment as an addition to the La Follette-Costigan bill, and it has been adopted; so that both measures now propose to appropriate exactly the same amount of money for the same purposes.

The distinction left between the two bills is regarding what might be termed the charity features of the two bills. The La Follette-Costigan bill provides that 40 per cent of the fund may be expended through the instrumentalities of the States under the supervision and subject to the approval of a Federal bureau, and that 60 per cent shall be expended directly by the bureau. The substitute provides that the entire amount of $375,000,000 shall be expended exclusively through State instrumentalities now dealing with charity, and that it shall be turned over to the States in the same proportion as provided in the La Follette-Costigan bill, but in the form of a loan instead of a gift directly to the individual.

Undoubtedly there are those here who, as the debate discloses, are unwilling to trust entirely, or at all without supervision, those charitable instrumentalities and institutions in the States, counties, and municipalities which have up to this time been dispensing charity, or, in other words, caring for the distressed who are unable to take care of themselves. On the other hand, there are Senators here who conscientiously believe that the sum of money proposed to be appropriated could be more advantageously, more equitably, and more effectively expended by those instrumentalities in the States that have had experience for two or three years in the administration of such relief.

I may say also that fundamental principles with regard to the function of the Federal Government affect the minds of some Senators in this body. There are those having a strong view with regard to the maintenance of State administration who hold the opinion that the establishment of another bureau in Washington for the purpose of administrating this large fund throughout all the States will result in inefficient administration, unconscious favoritism, and possibly neglect. Those views can not easily be changed by anyone.

Take, for instance, the speech delivered on yesterday by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. FESS], who is undoubtedly a leader of the Republican Party in this body, as he is also a leader of the Republican Party outside the Senate. The Senator from Ohio on yesterday stated that he thought he knew the views of the President of the United States on this subject. The Senator's views were very clearly expressed; he is one of those Senators who are opposed on principle to the administration by the Federal Government of affairs within the States which have heretofore been administered by the States and can be properly administered in the States.

In answer to questions of the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON]—if I remember rightly; and if not, I wish to be corrected—the Senator from Ohio stated that the proposal to loan money to States was in line with the legislation already enacted in what is known as the Reconstruction Finance Corporation act, wherein the Government is authorized to make loans for the purpose of aiding banks, railroads, and so forth.

The Senator from Ohio further stated, if I recollect correctly—and the Senator is in his seat, and if I make an error in this statement I desire to be corrected—that if it became necessary or is necessary by reason of the inability of local instrumentalities, local governments, municipalities, or individuals to relieve the distress that exists, then he would be willing for the Government to assist, but that if the Government should do so the proper way to render aid would be along the lines of the substitute amendment; that is, by lending the money or that portion of it allocated to the States, or so much as was required in particular States, to be dispensed and distributed by the local agencies of the State, the municipalities, and charity boards. Therefore, so far as the Senator from Ohio is concerned, there is but one question in his mind on this subject, and that is as to whether or not the ability of the instrumentalities within the States is sufficient to cope with the emergency.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, will the Senator from Nevada yield to me?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. PITTMAN. I yield.

Mr. FESS. The Senator from Nevada has made a very clear statement of what I attempted to say yesterday.

Mr. PITTMAN. I thank the Senator. I believe that there are those on this side of the Chamber who hold quite similar views to those expressed by the Senator from Ohio.

The evidence, to my mind, is conclusive. I do not think anyone could have listened to the evidence and the testimony and the articles that have been read on the floor of this body and not know that there is distress and suffering in the country that is not to-day being relieved. I do not want to go so far as to say that there are human beings starving, but I do not consider for one moment that it is essential for a man or a woman or a child to be in an actual starving condition to be in distress. As the highest legislative body in this country, I think it is our duty to examine into the question as to whether or not existing instrumentalities not merely are saving human beings from starvation but are ministering to and relieving their distress as we feel the distress of human beings should be relieved.

Of course, the same degree of distress does not exist universally all over the United States. That has never happened and never will happen. In one State, such as Montana, suffering may be confined largely to the rural districts by reason of peculiar conditions that have existed there, while in another State, such as Michigan or New York, the rural communities may be getting along fairly well; but the great cities have millions and millions of unemployed who have no means of supplying the necessities of their families. The evidence indicates that in such places, while the charity of the people and the money that may be constitutionally raised by the States and municipalities are keeping body and soul together and possibly keeping away the wintry winds, still such relief as is thus being provided is not sufficient to meet the human demand upon the people of the country.

That is not all. The evidence discloses that conditions have been steadily growing worse. Every day there are hundreds and hundreds of thousands of helpless men, women, and children added to the list of those who have no means of support.

Again, the evidence discloses, while all communities and all States and all charitable institutions have made every effort to meet the emergency, that their resources are becoming depleted, their ability to meet the situation is being strained, and even those funds that are now available will inevitably be exhausted within the next month or two, without much hope of being replenished to an amount that is essential not only to meet conditions that now exist, but the increasing conditions of distress.

So we have to act. We must make available a sufficient fund so that, if it is required, it may be used. In the very nature of things it will take 20 or 30 or 40 days after we have authorized a fund before it can actually become available. If we should wait for a month or six weeks until impending conditions shall have arisen and then attempt to meet them we would be 30 or 40 days late in the effort to relieve the existing suffering.

The substitute provides $375,000,000 for use if required and when required. We will assume, for instance, that my State may never require any part of it. In that event the governor of the State would not call on that loan, because he knows that when he does so the amount thus loaned will be deducted from the road fund of that State in the future. I want to say to you, Mr. President, that the people of my State would rather have the road fund with which to employ men than the same amount of money in the form of a gratuity for other purposes. That may not be true elsewhere; probably it is not true in a great many places; but we have felt that while affording men the opportunity to work is the highest form of relief, the noblest form of relief, and the most natural form of relief, and, while that character of relief may be scattered out among many people by staggering the work, still it can not meet every emergency.

There are hundreds of thousands of men, women, and children who, by reason of age or poor health, are unable to earn their living at the present time by working. So it is essential, in addition to providing work wherever we can provide it, that we should also at all times have an available fund that may be called on by any State or any community to meet any emergency that may require the use of such a fund.

Now we are in this position: I think that a majority of this body are absolutely in favor of the remedy provided by these two bills; they are absolutely in favor of the expenditure of $375,000,000 on roads and on the streets, alleys, culverts, and bridges within the cities and municipalities of this country; they are in favor of making available an additional fund of $375,000,000 with which to meet any emergency that may arise by reason of the breaking down of the instrumentalities that are to-day, in a way at least, taking care of the distressed; but there are in the minds of some Senators here principles involved, as I have stated. There are some Senators who are so convinced that matters of this kind should be handled by the local officers of the State, by the charity boards in the State, in the municipalities, and elsewhere, that they are totally unwilling to surrender that principle of State rights and permit a bureau established in Washington to attempt to estimate, to measure, and to meet the exigencies in a State with which they are possibly totally unfamiliar.

So we come to this question, and we come to it frankly. Every Senator in this body, by his vote, is going to decide this question. Unless he votes for one of these provisions or has a better constructed provision, then he is against any form of relief being made available from the Federal Treasury of the United States. If, on the other hand, he votes for either the substitute amendment or the La Follette-Costigan bill as now amended, then by that vote he declares that he believes the conditions of this country are such that this fund must be made available by the Federal Government.

If there is any Senator here who votes and so casts his vote as to destroy both of these provisions, then he can not escape the position that he is absolutely opposed at this time to making any Federal funds available either for use through the States or directly through a bureau.

There is no escaping the fact. It can not be escaped by saying, "I was in favor of this, and I was opposed to that," or, "I was in favor of that and opposed to this," because by every form of parliamentary vote he will have an opportunity to place himself on record as to whether or not he is willing to make available Federal funds to meet any emergency of distress that may arise in this country beyond the control of States or local instrumentalities.

I think there is a burden on every Senator in this body. I think it is an individual burden. It is not a fight of the progressive Republicans there, nor the regular Republicans there, nor the Democrats here. It is a matter that appeals to the conscience, to the soul, and to the heart of every man in this body; and he will have to be responsible for his acts on this vote.

Mr. MORRISON. Mr. President, I desire to offer an amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. To the text of the bill?

Mr. MORRISON. Yes.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 1, line 8, it is proposed to strike out "$375,000,000" and insert "$125,000,000."

On page 2, line 2, after the word "provided" and the period, it is proposed to strike out down to and including the numerals "1932" and the period in line 3, in the following words:

Not more than $125,000,000 of this amount shall be expended in the fiscal year ending June 30, 1932.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator will state it.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Is this an amendment to the substitute or an amendment to the original bill?

The VICE PRESIDENT. It is an amendment to the original text.

Mr. MORRISON. Mr. President, under the La Follette-Costigan bill only $125,000,000 can be used for this relief between now and June 30 next. So far as I am concerned, I have been convinced that the United States Government ought to grant that much relief to the suffering and unemployed in our country. Beyond that I can not see my way. I am not willing to assume that this terrible condition will continue beyond that date. I do not believe it will continue beyond that date in anything like the present distressing condition.

This will carry us to the middle of the summer. We are enacting daily here measures which we hope are going to give relief to our distressed country. I think the burden is inescapable that this Government ought to help the other divisions of our Government—the States and the subdivisions. I prefer to do it through a loan, as the Black-Bulkley-Walsh bill provides; but if we can not do it in that way I am willing to vote for $125,000,000 in the La Follette-Costigan bill. I want to give this relief, and I am not willing to be diverted by any difference which I may feel with reference to the governmental institutions which we ought to use to accomplish it.

But, Mr. President, I do not believe that this Congress ought to enact emergency legislation going beyond the time which we all hope will find us out of the emergency and enjoying at least greatly improved conditions. It is true that we do not have to spend the money if it is not needed. I understand that, but it will be done. If this legislation is enacted, I dare say every dollar of the money will be expended, and it could be done under conditions when it ought not to be done, and under which, if Congress could now perceive, they would not permit it to be done.

If the amendments I have offered to both of these bills are adopted, we will get between now and June 30 next every dollar that we would get if the bills were passed without amendment.

Congress will meet again, fresh from the people, next winter. The present Congress will meet in December. We will have an election in the meantime, in which the people are going to hold a grand inquest over the affairs of this country. The new Congress will meet next spring. I presume we could not get the "lame duck" measure, as it is called, into operation with the next administration's inauguration; and it does seem to me, with all the other difficulties confronting this country, that if we legislate for the present unemployment and a few months ahead of us, we shall have met our duty.

I expect to offer these amendments to the Black amendment, reducing the amounts to $125,000,000. I expect to support that amendment. If it is defeated, I will support the La Follette bill or any bill with the same limitation in it, but, as I see my duty, I can not vote to appropriate hundreds of millions of dollars on the assumption that my country will be in its present distressed condition beyond the middle of next summer, June 30 next.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, just a word in regard to the amendment offered by the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. MORRISON].

All of the evidence taken by the Manufactures Committee is to the effect that if the authors of this bill have erred at all, they have erred on the side of not providing a sufficient sum to meet the critical emergency existing so far as unemployment is concerned. The witnesses were also in practically unanimous agreement that even should the economic recovery which the Senator from North Carolina predicts occur as soon and as completely as he hopes, the sum provided in the bill will be necessary due to the fact that the reabsorption of the unemployed following a depression is always very much slower than the economic recovery which takes place.

Therefore, I regret that I can not support the amendment offered by the Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. MORRISON. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I yield.

Mr. MORRISON. My statement was correct, was it not, that until June 30, 1932, $125,000,000 is all that could be spent under the Senator's bill, except the road feature of it, by reason of the Norris amendment?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. That is correct.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I have listened to a good deal of this debate. I have been hoping to hear some one suggest where this money is to come from, but I have listened in vain.

There is a yawning deficit in the Federal Treasury to-day. It has been estimated at $2,000,000,000. The new Secretary of the Treasury has just made a new guess, and the deficit is now estimated at two and a half billions. Where is the money to come from to satisfy this yawning deficit?

Not one word, so far as I have heard, has fallen from the lips of any Senator as to where these hundreds of millions are to be found.

The original La Follette-Costigan bill carried only a modest sum—only $375,000,000. Of course, I do not wish to attach any importance to trifles; but where is this $375,000,000 to come from?

And, mark you, these millions are to be given away. Why give this money; if it must be spent, why not devote it to necessary public improvements?

That appropriation alone would require every bushel of wheat produced in the United States in the year 1931. That appropriation alone would absorb every bushel of wheat produced in America during the last calendar year.

Under the amendment offered by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS], which shows his generosity, the amount is now doubled, $750,000,000. The Senator from Nebraska was not to be outdone by the trio of Senators on this side, Senators BLACK, WALSH, and BULKLEY. Their original venture was $750,000,000. That is three-fourths of a billion dollars, and not a word as to where this vast sum is to be found!

The two bills now involved, as I understand, $750,000,000 each. Well, what of it?

As they now stand, it would require practically every bushel of wheat and every bale of cotton produced by our prosperous farmers last year to meet this vast appropriation.

Some Senators seem to confuse Uncle Sam with Santa Claus. Is there no limit to the capacity of our taxpayers to pay? I am led to make this observation by the discussion on yesterday, when it was said that the people and the wealth of Cleveland, and the people and the wealth of New York City were not equal to the task, were not able to provide for the hungry and unemployed within their gates, that somebody somewhere else must furnish the money to feed the unemployed in those metropolitan cities.

I assume that means that we must invade our prosperous rural communities and require our farmers, selling their hogs to-day for less than 3 cents a pound, cattle at 5 cents a pound, cotton at a nickel a pound, oats at 15 cents a bushel, corn at 25 cents a bushel, and wheat at 35 cents a bushel, to provide the ways and means to feed the hungry and to clothe the naked within our metropolitan cities.

Senators seem to say let your sympathy be your guide. Sympathy may appropriate but, sir, privation must pay.

Mr. President, I can not consent to vote for any legislation of this kind that does not make provision within its own terms to meet the exactions upon the Federal Treasury.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. MORRISON].

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, will not the Chair advise what the pending amendment is?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be reported.

The CHIEF CLERK. The Senator from North Carolina moves, on page 1, line 8, to strike out "$375,000,000" and to insert in lieu thereof "$125,000,000," and on page 2, lines 2 and 3, to strike out the words "Not more than $125,000,000 of this amount shall be expended in the fiscal year ending June 30, 1932."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I offer an amendment, on page 7, line 12, after the word "act," the following proviso:

Provided, That in any State where no state-wide board of charities exists, or no special emergency organization has been set up, the amount allotted to any such State shall be distributed by the action of the governor and the State board constituted for controlling the financial affairs of such State, if such board exists; and, if it does not exist, by the governor.

I believe the Senators in charge of the bill have agreed to the amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Tennessee.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, I am not clear whether the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. MORRISON] offered an amendment to the substitute as well as to the original text.

Mr. MORRISON. Mr. President, I have here an amendment which I will offer to the substitute as soon as it is before the Senate, the same as the amendment just voted on.

Mr. FRAZIER. Mr. President, I want to say just a word bearing on the original measure. In my opinion, the unemployment situation has become so desperate that something must be done by the United States Government to take care of the situation. I do not share the feeling expressed by some of those who have spoken against this measure, that there is any danger of setting a precedent in taking care of those suffering from hunger. I believe that those people, citizens of the United States, workers who are out of employment because of no fault of their own, are entitled to have something done for them by the Government. I believe it is one of the functions of the Government to take care of its people, that it is just as much the function of the Government to take care of those out of employment, because of no fault of their own, those who can not get employment, who can not find work, in order to see that they are not subjected to hunger and disease, as it is to take care of the business interests of this Nation, and more so.

Some of the Senators who have spoken against the measure have expressed a fear that this would be a bad precedent, that it would undermine the morals of the workers, get them on a dole system, and that they could not be persuaded to work again, and all that kind of thing.

Recently, in some of the papers, statements have been made, especially concerning the situation in Chicago, to the effect that there was likely to be mob violence by so-called unemployed hunger groups. The statement was made that there were some emergency plans for handling mobs in Chicago and in the State of Illinois by the National Guard there. I wired to the general in charge of the headquarters of the Thirty-third Division in Chicago, General Keehn, and asked him for a copy of their regulations. He sent me a copy, explaining that they had had careful thought, that they were not an emergency proposition, as some seemed to think they might be. I note, however, on the title of this pamphlet the words "Emergency Plans for Domestic Disturbances."

In these rules there is set forth what the National Guard is supposed to do to take care of disturbances of any kind.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. FRAZIER. Certainly.

Mr. REED. Is that a pamphlet issued by the War Department?

Mr. FRAZIER. This is from the headquarters of the Thirty-third Division, Illinois National Guard, Chicago, Ill. It quotes some of the regulations from the War Department, however.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. FRAZIER. I yield.

Mr. LEWIS. I have heard for the first time from the eminent Senator from North Dakota that there has been an allusion on this floor by some Senator to the fact that there is some fear expressed in the city of Chicago that the present conditions threaten to bring on lawlessness as a result of which the police of the local constabulary, known as the State Guard, or the National Army, may be brought in as necessary to repress disorder and establish peace in that community.

I beg to say to my honorable friend the Senator from North Dakota that there are no conditions upon which such accusation can be justified. The city of Chicago will protect herself as to peace and order. Our State is able to maintain the integrity and decency of its citizenship. There will be no condition, there will arrive no State condition, which will not be overcome in that community by the ordinary appeals for peace and honor.

The intimation from some source, to which my honorable friend alludes, as to its being necessary for Chicago to call on the National Guard on the theory that disorder, lawlessness, and dishonor will be entailed upon that community, has no foundation, and unhappily works a slander to its peaceful citizenship. I beg to resent it.

Mr. FRAZIER. Mr. President, the Senator from Illinois misunderstood my statement. I did not say or intimate that those statements were made here on the floor of the Senate. What I did say was that some of the newspapers throughout the country had carried statements to that effect.

Mr. LEWIS. Then I misunderstood the Senator.

Mr. FRAZIER. I hope the Senator from Illinois is correct in saying that no such conditions will arise. But I want to read some of the statements over the signature of the adjutant general of the State of Illinois, and, of course, the National Guard, under present law, are a part of the Regular Army of the United States, and the expense of the training of the National Guard, and so on, is paid out of the War Department appropriations.

In these plans the general training of the National Guard is spoken of, and there is a paragraph which specifies the different kinds of riots which they may be called upon to quell. The first is "Race riots—whites versus blacks."

The second is "Strikes."

The third is "Industrial disorders radically inspired." There is a note under that:

If the present industrial depression continues for an extended period, (3) may take the place of (1)."

No. (3) is the subdivision, "Industrial disorders radically inspired." No. (1) is "Race riots."

If the present industrial depression continues for an extended period, (3) may take the place of (1) or merge with it. Any general, extended unemployment will materially expedite and assist radical uprisings. These uprisings may be looked for among the miners and steel workers, both of which trades contain a large political radical element. If times are sufficiently bad, a race riot may be conveniently used to cover a radical (communist) uprising.

On another page there is a paragraph as follows:

RADICAL ACTIVITIES (COMMUNIST)

Ultraradical (communist) activities have increased materially in Illinois during 1930.

The steel workers and miners have a large proportion of their personnel radically inclined politically. These trades offer a fertile field for communist propaganda, which is increased in proportion as unemployment increases.

Mr. President, I am reading this to show that there is a danger, according to the adjutant general of the State of Illinois, of radical—communist—uprisings if the present unemployment is allowed to go on and increase as it is doing.

The next statement I think the junior Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS] will be interested in, and I am glad to see him on the floor. It is subparagraph (c), under article 5, which reads:

> Centers of radical activities, mainly communist, are known to have been established in the following places (Report U. S. Department of Justice).

They name 22 cities in the State of Illinois. I will not read the names of the cities, but they are given here. It goes on to say:

> It is impossible to state definitely whether or not communist centers actually exist at the above places at the present time as these "centers" rapidly shift from place to place. However, as the above-mentioned places at one time were known to be "Radical centers" they should be viewed with suspicion until proved to the contrary.

This is over the signature of Major General Keehn, of Illinois, and two or three other Army officers, under date of September 30, 1931.

Then a couple of pages further over under the title of "Emergency plan, general. Appendix No. 3 to part 1, G–3 plan," under subtitle C, tactical instructions, "Extracts from War Department Document No. 882," under "subtitle (a)" of that division I find this:

> Troops should never be ordered on riot duty without an ample supply of ball ammunition. Blank cartridges should never be fired at a mob. If ball ammunition is expected from the first, moral effect is gained. It will not have to be used more than once, if at all. (Note: When troops of the Illinois National Guard are ordered on active duty to suppress domestic disorders, under no circumstances will blank ammunition be issued to them.)

Under subparagraph (b) I find this:

> Never fire above the heads of rioters. The aim should be low.

I was looking over this pamphlet in my office a few days ago and a farmer from my State came in. I read to him that particular part about using ball ammunition, and that the aim should be low. He said, "That is good logic on the part of the National Guard. If they aim low and strike those hungry mobs in the stomach there will be no resistance for the bullet. It will go right through and probably kill half a dozen of the mobbers. That will be real economy on the part of the National Guard in the saving of ammunition." In my estimation that is not the kind of economy the United States Congress should practice.

It seems to me it is just the opposite of economy to refuse to pass a bill making an appropriation to take care of the people who are unemployed in our great industrial centers in the Nation at this time, and that the real danger is not the danger of paying these men and women a dole that we can not get away from in the future—not the danger of undermining their morals with the thought that they may become so lazy, or whatever it may be termed, that they will not want to work in the future but will want to continue on the dole. I do not believe that is the situation at all.

I think the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] was conservative yesterday when he said that 90 per cent of the unemployed would be glad to go to work and would refuse a dole or any gift of money at the present time if they were given a chance to work.

I believe the percentage could be put higher than that. I doubt very much if there is more than 1 per cent of the unemployed in the United States to-day who would not take a job if offered to them, practically any kind of a job. I have had letters, as other Members of the Senate have had, from many people. Only the other day I had a letter from a young man whom I used to know very well, a former neighbor of mine, now living on the west coast. He had served in the Army. He is a gas engineer, an automobile mechanic. He said, "I have not been able to get a job for months." His father and mother are well up in years and are going hungry, he said, out in the great State of California. There are unemployed out there, the same as in all the other States of the Union. The situation is a desperate one. Something should be done as a real emergency measure to take care of the situation.

I want to read a few more of these orders. One subdivision reads:

> Never try to bluff a mob.

These regulations, of course, are gotten out by the War Department and the National Guard to take care of the situation. I am not criticizing them for their regulations, but it seems to me that this would be a mighty poor way to take care of the hungry and the unemployed.

Paragraph 33 reads:

> Psychologically, at first, mobs are cowards. They only gain courage as they find that those whose duty it is to suppress them are themselves cowards. A mob is not to be feared when it is first aroused.

Under section 36 I find this:

> Mobs, as a rule, are made up of cowards, not necessarily physical cowards but moral cowards.

It goes on to say that many of the people who urge the mobbers on are cowards that stay in the rear of the mob, and the regulations advocate that there should be a rear or flank attack upon the mob to break it up. In another place it is stated that it is a good plan to have some sharpshooters on top of high buildings or in high windows to pick off some of those so-called cowards at the back of the mob, to get them in retreat, and then the rest of the mob will follow like a flock of sheep.

That might be good tactics for the National Guard to follow under the Regular Army, which they are under to-day; but it seems to be mighty poor tactics and a mighty poor policy for the United States to follow if we are going to deny assistance by the Federal Government to those who are unemployed because of no fault of their own, but because they can not get work. It is not charity that the unemployed want. They want work, but they can not get work. Therefore it seems to me it is up to Congress to make provision to assist the States and cities, which unfortunately can not take care of their unemployed under present circumstances, as it is generally admitted they can not. The sum of $5 a week for a family of four or five is not enough to enable people to live. They are blamed and criticized because they are radically inclined. Who can blame the head of a family for being radical under conditions of that kind?

These conditions of unemployment, the people going hungry, the families, wives, and children, going hungry, are doing more to spread communism in the United States than anything else that can happen. It seems to me if anyone is afraid of a radical uprising, about which we have heard so much, that he would realize that the passage of the measure before the Senate to-day to help take care of the unemployed and hungry people will do more to stop the spread of communism or any other radical movement than anything else we can do. I hope the measure will be passed.

Mr. WAGNER. Mr. President, on the question which is now before us some elements of the public may choose to discount the testimony of social workers, but even the dry statistical information published by the Government is overflowing with proof that the plight of hundreds of thousands of families is desperate, that the need for immediate relief is irrepressible. Month after month we have been receiving the same official reports of the steadily growing paralysis which is overtaking every branch of trade and industry. The latest report showed a further decline in production. The volume of carloadings continues to diminish; employment is shrinking without abatement; the total of pay rolls in manufacturing industries has been cut in half when compared with the average for 1926. The December index stood at the startlingly low level of 50.9.

What do these indices mean? An index is, after all, but a shorthand expression for a multiplicity of facts. In the present instance these indices are an abbreviation of thousands upon thousands of human tragedies, thousands of cases of soul-racking want and demoralizing poverty. If we could but place the magnifying glass upon one of these innocent-looking index numbers, we would see sights that would make our blood run cold, that would fill us with shame and remorse that we have permitted such suffering to exist in the richest land on the surface of the earth.

Let me read a single news item which very clearly reveals how the loss and lack of earnings for the past three years have worked their havoc upon our citizens. This appeared in the New York American of Thursday, January 28, 1932:

EVICTION CASES REACH 16,000 SINCE NEW YEAR—FIVE MARSHALS' OFFICES HAVE THREE TIMES MORE WORK THAN NORMAL; MANY GET RELIEF

Unemployment distress has reached such a degree this month that more than 16,000 cases of eviction have been placed on court calendars or in the hands of marshals since the first of the year, the New York American learned yesterday.

Chief Marshal Charles Jacobs revealed more than 10,000 of these cases have been brought to his own office by landlords, tenants, or the 78 marshals of the five boroughs. Cases are three times as numerous as in normal years.

DECEMBER WORST MONTH

The total of eviction cases last year was 198,738, as compared with 153,731 in 1930. December was the worst month from that standpoint in the history of the marshals' work, totaling 19,167, as compared with 14,307 in December, 1930.

Jacobs said many cases have been settled by marshals by bringing landlords and tenants together or by referring cases to the home-relief bureau or to the school authorities.

OTHER OFFICES HELP

Various city departments have contributed to his office some 20 clerks to assist in investigating and handling cases which may be referred to home-relief bureaus.

Sixteen thousand evictions in one small quarter of the United States during a period of less than one month! Sixteen thousand families in a single city undergoing the marrow-chilling experience of homelessness. If there be any more bitter drop in the cup of life, I have not heard of it.

While these events are in hot pursuit of each other we still hear the inquiries: Has the Federal Government any responsibility in the premises? Has need been established?

Why, Mr. President, can there be any function of government which takes precedence over the obligation to prevent such suffering and to mitigate such cruelty? If that is not the paramount duty of government, then all government is a luxury to be indulged in only in days of prosperity. I do not have to search in the Constitution for the power to relieve such misery. I presume it is present there as it must be present in every human instrument of government. Upon it depend the very existence and safety of the people whom the Constitution was intended to govern.

We failed to prevent the present catastrophe. Shall we fail again when it becomes our duty to mitigate its hardships? I have read the testimony taken before a subcommittee of the Committee on Manufactures, of which the able Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] is chairman. Having read that, I require no further proof that the need for Federal relief is fully established. After all, need is not a felony, the proof of which must be established beyond a reasonable doubt. If we should be guilty of error, I much prefer to be guilty of error on the side of mercy and generosity.

Some would suggest that we should not act until the States and local communities have formally presented their several petitions for relief. Why should that course be necessary? Are we not competent ourselves to find the facts? Are we not here for the very purpose of speaking for these States and communities? We all know very well the sad and tragic truth. We ought not to embrace delay for the sake of decorous procedure. Nor should we overlook the very human fact that pride restrains the States as it restrains the individual from appealing for relief. We must not shelter ourselves behind the unwillingness of the States to come here as supplicants. It is the turn of the Federal Government to proffer its assistance.

The only valid issue that is open for debate is concerned with method. How can the Federal Government best discharge its responsibility? How can it most effectively render assistance in the present emergency?

Two major methods are available; and both are necessary. The first calls for the immediate expansion of public construction. The second requires the provision of funds for emergency relief.

As far as the first is concerned I have already submitted a resolution and addressed the Senate upon it, which when adopted will put in motion the machinery created in the last Congress for the concentration of public construction in this period of stress. The chief virtue of construction is that it not only affords relief, but it provides jobs for the idle, revitalizes industry and agriculture, and releases vast forces for the Nation's recuperation from its present distress. Were such a program of intense construction now in progress it would have very substantially reduced the pressure on local relief efforts and made it possible for local agencies to perform the task which they courageously undertook, but which is now beyond them.

The need for the inauguration of such a bonded construction program is becoming daily more intense. Further delay is dangerous. I believe we should proceed to the consideration of the construction resolution as soon as the pending bill is disposed of.

The bill which is before us, introduced by Senators LA FOLLETTE and COSTIGAN, is addressed to the second major method of Federal assistance. It would create a system for distributing to the States $375,000,000 during the next two years for emergency relief purposes.

In some quarters the bill, no matter what form it may finally take, will be condemned as a dole. I do not propose to be intimidated by that word. We are reliably informed that 70 per cent of the relief now administered to the unemployed is provided out of State and local treasuries. This bill will therefore introduce no new principle. It will simply replenish those State relief funds which have been drained dry by the unprecedented demand.

There is a further reason why Federal relief is essential. Many local communities have exhausted their taxing power. I have reference not only to constitutional limitations but to the more important financial limitations. The great source of local revenue is the general property tax. About two-thirds of the revenue of the cities is collected in that manner. Twenty States rely upon the general property tax for more than one-fourth of the State revenue. Any further burden upon States and municipalities means therefore additional burdens upon the home owner and rent payer—a burden which each of them must carry whether he has an income or not. Further local taxation means a tax which the home owner must pay, although he is himself one of the unemployed. The real property tax has already become too heavy. It can not be added to. If we relegate the increasing number of unemployed to the unassisted efforts of their local communities, we should know that we are asking them to drink of a fountain that will not and can not provide any more than it is now providing. The only remaining source of assistance is the Federal Government, and there is every reason in logic and humanity why the Federal Government should respond.

Mr. President, let no one be under the impression that this bill is over-generous in the provision it makes for relief. The bill provides for an approximate expenditure of $187,000,000 a year for the next two years. This should be compared with the loss in wages alone, which is estimated to exceed eleven thousand million dollars in 1931. It is obvious that the Federal money authorized, plus all that the States, localities, and private agencies may make available, will be barely sufficient to provide the destitute with the essentials of keeping body and soul together.

There is in this Chamber a unanimous desire to extend relief to our distressed citizens. All of us are moved by the same human promptings to allay the suffering of our fellowmen. We may differ over the method; we joined, however, in pursuing a common and humanitarian aim.

So completely am I convinced of the desperate urgency of relief that I have been willing and still am willing to defer to the judgment of others on the question of method. To make relief funds somehow available—that end is all-important. The means are of secondary consideration.

During the past week, however, the debate has taken such a turn as to give rise to the fear that relief may be denied for the reason that the very friends of relief can not agree upon a method of distribution. Such a result would add despair to disaster in thousands upon thousands of American homes. Such an outcome is unthinkable.

I believe we can find a formula through which our common purpose can be given expression. With that object in view, I shall attempt to indicate the major points of difference which have thus far developed.

Four principal questions, all concerned with method, are now in dispute:

First. How shall the relief funds be allocated to the States?

Second. How shall the relief funds be administered?

Third. Shall the relief funds made available to the States be reimbursed to the Federal Government, and if so, in what manner?

Fourth. Shall a road-construction program be included in the pending relief legislation?

I should like to consider each of these questions briefly:

First, then, the question af allocation. The bill as presented by Senators LA FOLLETTE and COSTIGAN provides that 40 per cent of the appropriation shall be allocated to the States in proportion to population and 60 per cent on the basis of need. The authors of the substitute bill—Senators BLACK, WALSH of Montana, and BULKLEY—obviously do not wish to confer such large powers of allocation upon any board or bureau. Under the substitute bill the entire amount of the appropriation would be apportioned on the basis of population.

It seems to me that both objects can in large measure be obtained by apportioning the relief funds to the States in proportion to their number of unemployed as disclosed by the census of 1930. By that method we avoid the danger of excessive power in a bureau and at the same time we make available the relief fund where is most sorely needed.

A few examples will illustrate my point.

Illinois, which in 1930 had almost 9 per cent of the unemployed of the United States, had but 6.2 per cent of the Nation's population.

Michigan accounted for 6.2 per cent of the unemployed, but for only 3.9 per cent of the population.

Iowa, on the other hand, which contained only 1 per cent of the unemployed represents 2 per cent of the population.

The disparity is strikingly revealed when we compare Rhode Island and South Dakota. Rhode Island had eight times as much unemployment as South Dakota; but, under the allocation on the basis of population, South Dakota would receive more Federal relief than Rhode Island.

The argument is made that unemployment figures are of a past date, that they are no longer accurate. But we are only concerned with ratios and not with absolute figures, and all expert opinion is unanimous that the industrial States now contain an even greater percentage of the total number of unemployed than in 1930, when the census of unemployment was taken along with the census of population.

I have a letter from Mr. Dewhurst, chief of the division of statistical research of the Department of Commerce, in which he shows himself to be in accord with the views I have expressed. I ask permission to have printed in the RECORD, as a part of my remarks, his letter together with a table showing the number of unemployed in each State according to the census of 1930, and the percentage apportioned to each State on the basis of unemployment and the percentage apportioned on the basis of population.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, permission is granted.

The letter and table are as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF COMMERCE,
BUREAU OF FOREIGN AND DOMESTIC COMMERCE,
Washington, February 3, 1932.

Hon. ROBERT F. WAGNER,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: This is in reply to your letter of February 2, requesting my opinion regarding the distribution of unemployment in the States. As you know, there are no current statistics which would make it possible to give an exact quantitative measurement of the amount of unemployment in each State.

My own judgment is, however, that the increase in unemployment which has occurred since the time of the census has fallen most heavily in those States in which unemployment was shown to be most severe in April, 1930. In other words, if the States were ranked according to the severity of unemployment existing in each, my belief is that the ranking would be much the same as at the time of the census, but that the disparity of "spread" between those States with the lowest percentage of unemployment and those with the largest percentage would be greater now than in April, 1930.

This conclusion is based upon an examination of the distribution of unemployment as reported in the census of 1930 and a study of the employment indexes published by the Bureau of Labor Statistics. The States in which the percentage of gainfully occupied in classes A and B combined was greatest were also those States which are predominantly industrial in character, and it is precisely from these occupations (i. e., manufacturing, mining, and construction, as well as railroads) that the largest numbers have been laid off since April, 1930. The increase in unemployment has been relatively less severe in the more widely distributed mercantile and service occupations and in agriculture, so that it would seem that the nonindustrial States have experienced a somewhat less pronounced increase of unemployment.

Another factor which would tend to cause a relatively greater increase of unemployment in the States which already had a large percentage of unemployment in April, 1930, is that these States, such as Michigan, Illinois, Massachusetts, Pennsylvania, Rhode Island, New York, etc., are largely urban in character, with large cities into which the casual unemployed labor from the rural sections tends to drift in midwinter. Of course, this is merely stating what is generally recognized by students of the subject—that unemployment is largely an industrial and urban phenomenon.

I am sure you understand that in a matter of this kind I can only express my own personal conclusions. If I can be of further assistance, please do not hesitate to call upon me.

Cordially yours,

J. FREDERIC DEWHURST,
Acting Chief Division of Economic Research.

Mr. WAGNER. The fact that in the industrial States there is now a greater percentage of the total number of unemployed than in 1930 is strongly corroborated by a special report of the Bureau of the Census entitled "Relief Expenditures by Governmental and Private Organizations, 1929 and 1931." It reveals that in the industrial States there was a much larger percentage of increase of relief expenditures in 1931 over 1929 than in the agricultural States. Since the object of the legislation is to relieve the hardship of unemployment, it seems plain to me that apportionment of the funds on the basis of the unemployment census of 1930, while not perfect, is certainly a superior method of making available relief where it is most sorely needed.

I turn now to the question of administration. The La Follette-Costigan bill creates a board with elaborate duties and extensive powers of investigation and supervision. It would examine State estimates and expenditures for relief, approve or disapprove of State methods and even of the State personnel charged with administering relief within a State.

The substitute bill, offered by my colleagues, dispenses with a board and, of necessity, with all supervision over the administration of the Federal funds within the States. There is merit, it seems to me, in the contention that the pending bill is top-heavy with administrative details. On the other hand, it has always been regarded as entirely proper that the Federal Government should have a degree of authority over the expenditure of its funds within the States. There is provision for that purpose in every other measure of Federal aid. I propose, therefore, that we create a temporary board, with extremely limited jurisdiction, to whom a State applying for the benefits of the act shall submit a plan of proposed administration for approval. Such a procedure would assure proper use of the Federal funds, and at the same time insure the State complete autonomy within its borders.

It is the third question, Mr. President, which has proved most troublesome. Shall the relief funds made available to the States be reimbursed to the Federal Government and, if so, in what manner? The La Follette-Costigan bill provides for outright grants to the States. The substitute proposed by my colleagues provides in section 5 that no payment shall be made to any State until the governor shall declare that he will recommend to the legislature of his State and also to the people thereof such action as may be necessary and appropriate to insure the repayment to the United States of all amounts received by the State.

The question which must occur to anyone who reads this proposal is this: Does it provide for loans to the States or does it provide for grants? If it be a loan, where is the promise to repay? If it be a loan, what provision is made for the States that can not borrow under their constitutions or have exhausted their constitutional borrowing power? If it be a loan, when shall it be repaid to the Federal Government?

If it is not a loan that the substitute bill proposes, but an outright grant to the States, then wherein does it differ in principle from the pending bill? If it is a grant that is intended, why should we not say so explicitly?

If the proposal makes provision for what is neither a loan nor a grant, but an inchoate financial arrangement which can be turned into a loan or a grant by the separate will of each of the States, then it seems to me that we are not fair. One State may repay the money to the Federal Government; another State may not; both will be strictly within their rights. That is scarcely a procedure dictated by the principle of equal treatment.

The Senator from Maryland [Mr. TYDINGS] has offered an amendment to the substitute. It provides, in part, that no State shall receive any portion of the moneys appropriated under the pending bill unless the legislature and the governor certify that they consider any amount advanced by the Federal Government as a loan only and that the State is morally bound to repay the sum so advanced.

This amendment, apparently, proposes to clarify the financial relationship between the Federal Government and the States arising out of the operation of the substitute bill. Under the amendment of the Senator from Maryland, the State would be morally obligated to the Federal Government. The same questions again become pertinent. If the State has not the legal power to obligate itself financially, then wherefrom does it derive the power to obligate itself morally?

If there be inhibitions in the State constitution which prevent the State from borrowing—and there are such inhibitions in most of the States—then I submit that the same restriction would attach to any attempt of the State legislature to bind the State morally to pay the relief money accepted. I doubt that any governor or State legislature so restricted by its constitution would be willing to submit to the condition stated in this amendment.

There can be no doubt but that in every State which accepted relief on such terms, the question of repaying the Federal Government would become a political issue and be the cause of local dissension. The honor of each State, which ought to be beyond debate, would be dragged down from its pedestal into the rough and tumble of partisan dispute.

I take the liberty, therefore, of submitting the following proposal: That the amount of any grant made to any State shall be reimbursed to the Federal Government by making annual deductions, beginning with the fiscal year 1937, from moneys payable under regular apportionments for Federal-aid highway grants, of an amount equal to one-fifth of the share which such State would be entitled to receive under such apportionment, or of an amount equal to one-fifth of the grant, whichever is the lesser, until the sum of the deductions equals the total amount of the grant.

What I propose, in other words, is, strictly speaking, neither loan nor gift, but a present advance of funds which the State will in the course of time receive in any event. It avoids the constitutional difficulties which affect the amendment of the Senator from Maryland, and simplifies the process of balancing the accounts between the States and the Federal Government. The deductions would not begin until 1937, by which time we are fairly certain the States will have recovered from their present difficulties; at least, we fervently hope so. Furthermore, the deductions are so adjusted as not to impose too large a burden upon any State during any one year, since they will spread over a minimum period of five years, and in no year can more than a fifth of the highway funds be withheld.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. WAGNER. I do.

Mr. BORAH. I suppose it would be within the power of Congress to excuse that payment?

Mr. WAGNER. At some subsequent time?

Mr. BORAH. Yes.

Mr. WAGNER. Yes; there is no question about that.

Every precaution, in my judgment, is thus taken to prevent serious impairment of the normal functioning of the States' finances.

The final point of difference is presented by that portion of the substitute bill presented by my colleagues which authorizes an additional sum of $375,000,000 for highway construction. Personally I should have preferred to see that provision carried in a general emergency construction bill, which should be of much larger dimensions, and is necessary to supplement the relief which the present bill would make available. That, however, is but a matter of form. It makes little difference by what legislative machinery we proceed as long as we do our full job in extending to the people of the United States a helping hand in this extraordinary emergency.

That, I repeat, is our principal concern. In my judgment, the proposal I have submitted constitutes a satisfactory solution to the questions that have been debated in this Chamber during the past week. It is tendered in the hope that it may seem so to a majority. Should it prove unacceptable, I shall vote to support the bill presented by Senators LA FOLLETTE and COSTIGAN.

Mr. President, the emergency which faces us will not wait. All eyes are now turned to the Federal Government, giving expression to the prayerful inquiry, "Will the Federal Government do its duty?"

We ought to look at the whole problem which we are trying to solve by means of construction and relief in its true perspective. The need which we are trying to satisfy is superior to each and every need for which money is allotted in the National Budget. I make no exception. I care not whether we consider the legislative, executive, or judicial division of our Government; they are all important, but the preservation of human life comes first.

We still find in this country a few minds which can not comprehend that our entire history is built on blocks of innovation upon a foundation of invention. They take fright at a novelty. They condemn the present measure as without precedent. Suppose it were without precedent, of what relevance is that? So is the severity of the present depression unprecedented. So is it without precedent to find such extensive poverty and want in a land so rich that no parallel can be found for it in all recorded history.

Must we stay our hand from doing what is right, what is just, what is humane, because the books do not contain a record of a similar performance in the past? When a voice in the wilderness first proclaimed "Thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself," that was without precedent; but it has changed the face of civilization through these thousands of years. Now our neighbors are in distress. Their children are undernourished. They and their wives are without food, clothing, and shelter. Through no fault on their part they are daily eating the tear-stained bread of despair. Is it really without precedent in such circumstances for a Nation to make a common effort to rise to the aid of its unfortunate citizens? I deny it. It is not true because it can not be true.

I express the hope, which is shared by millions of our citizens throughout the length and breadth of our country, that this Congress will not halt, will not pause in its efforts, until it has made relief available to those who suffer from the national adversity.

Mr. REED obtained the floor.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, the Senator from Pennsylvania is about to address himself to the pending measure?

Mr. KEAN. I desire to announce that my colleague [Mr. BARBOUR] is unavoidably absent, having gone to a Lincoln Day celebration. I should like to have this announcement stand for the day.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Eighty-nine Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I am perfectly well aware of the fact that nothing which can be said about the pending bill at this time can by any possibility change a vote in this Chamber. I think all of us have pretty definitely made up our minds as to what our attitude should be on the original bill and on the substitute. So that it is not with any vain hope of affecting the result of the coming vote but only in order that those who sent me here might understand the reasons for my vote, that I rise to speak.

I want first of all to compliment the Senator from New York [Mr. WAGNER], who has just spoken, for his fairness in admitting that every one of us on the floor of this Chamber is equally sincere in the desire to bring whatever help may properly be brought, within the authority that is given to us, to those of our fellow citizens who to-day are in distress. I am perfectly ready to grant to every man on this floor who disagrees with me that his sincere desire to help is quite as great as my own. I think we owe it to one another to leave out any implications that those of us who are unable to concur with the thought of the proponents of this bill are moved by hardness of heart or indifference to suffering.

Another thing I should like to state, because it is my deep belief, is that a matter of this sort ought not to be determined by a barrage of epithets. It is no argument against this bill to say that it provides for a dole. "Dole" is an epithet which people understand differently. I do not base my opposition to the measure upon any such ground, although I do sincerely dislike those provisions in section 12 of the bill which provide that the relief contemplated by the bill means relief in the form of money or commodities furnished by the State or its civil subdivisions to persons either at home or in temporary shelters.

Leaving out all reference to the word "dole," it seems to me extremely unwise for relief to be furnished in the form of money, because experience has shown, both abroad and here, that that is the most wasteful and inefficient possible means of giving relief to persons who lack food or shelter or clothing.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. REED. I yield.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. May I say to the Senator that there is no intention on the part of the authors of the bill that any new system shall be set up in the various localities for the payment of money to individuals? However, as the Senator probably knows, there are many communities in the country where work relief is being provided—that is, work is being provided on the basis of need and people are being paid a certain set amount for a day's work on those work-relief projects. It was felt that in view of the fact that there were these various places where this type of relief was being provided, the Federal Government, if it aided at all, should not attempt to force those communities to abandon the type of relief which they have in operation.

If the Senator would be interested, I would refer him, as an example of what I had in mind, to the testimony of the city manager of Grand Rapids, Mich., who testified that all their relief in that city was being handled in that manner.

Mr. REED. I thank the Senator. In fact, in my own city of Pittsburgh a very large part of the relief is being furnished in just that same way, in the form of work, and wages are paid out of the emergency community relief fund.

I gained the impression which I have stated from a reading of section 12, which seemed to provide for relief in the form of money or in the form of wages or other compensation for work furnished on the basis of need. In stating it in the alternative it seemed to me to contemplate money benefit, without work being done in exchange. I am glad to be corrected.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I merely wanted the Senator to understand what the intent was.

Mr. REED. I think it might be made a little clearer. However, to pass on, I agree with every word that was said yesterday by my eloquent friend the senior Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] when he stated that, given necessity sufficiently great, all principle has to yield against it; that we are not going to stand on time-worn and time-honored conceptions of constitutional limitations in the presence of starvation and death. If there be no other way of preventing Americans from starving, every one of us, convinced that such a condition exists, will gladly yield any prejudice regarding the governmental unit which ought to furnish the relief, and will try to meet the necessity.

I venture to think that the Senator from Ohio [Mr. FESS] expressed the same thought—at least I conceive that he meant to—as that expressed by the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH], namely, that, granted that necessity is here, we are willing to do anything within our power to meet it. Where we differ is not in that statement of principle, but in our perception of the existence of that state of necessity at this time. It is not that in principle we differ at all, the Senator from Idaho and those of us who take the side opposite from him. It is in our diagnosis and understanding of the sort of conditions which obtain at the present moment.

I do not think that necessity has arisen or that it is within reasonable contemplation at the present time. I do not think the country has reached that state of abysmal collapse where the local governments, the States, the counties, the poor districts, the cities, have become impotent to help the distressed within their own boundaries. If I did think so, and if I thought that the exercise of the local taxing power, and the appeal to local generosity had failed, and that the Federal taxing power could be resorted to in order to remedy that failure, then I would vote with the Senator from Idaho in favor of some such proposition as the pending one. But I do most firmly believe that we are not within far-sighting distance of any such state of collapse as that.

The questionnaire sent out by the able Senator from Wisconsin surely tempted each of these communities to say that it would be glad to receive a Federal grant. Perhaps I had better read at this point the wording of the seventh question addressed to the mayors of the communities, which made it almost impossible for them to answer that they would not take the money. This was the question:

> Do you favor a Federal appropriation to assist the local governments in meeting their emergency relief burdens, and do you feel that such an appropriation would be of aid in providing more adequate relief for the needy or in lessening the burden on local taxpayers?

Senators will notice the double-barreled question; first, do you favor a Federal appropriation, and, second, do you feel that such an appropriation would be of aid in meeting the local burden?

It is almost self-evident that whether one favored a Federal appropriation or not, he had to answer "yes" to the last half of that question. Of course, any money from anywhere would help to lighten the local burden. Yet, although the question was phrased in that tempting language, I am proud to say that of the responses from my own State, the "yeses" were only 28, the "noes" 25, and those who were undecided were 11. I honor them for their responses to the temptation presented by that most adroitly worded question.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, may I say to the Senator that there was no necessity for any person responding to that questionnaire to answer the question "yes" or "no." If the Senator will read the numerous replies which came, he will find that in many instances long answers were made to the question. Many of the questions in the questionnaire contained more than one question.

Mr. REED. I am not finding fault with the Senator for sending out the question. I merely want to call attention to the fact that while some of the mayors sent back essays on Federal and State sovereignty, many of them answered the question with a categorical "yes" or a categorical "no."

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. True. I would also like to direct the Senator's attention to the fact that some of the replies dealt directly with the question of whether it would relieve the local burden or not, and contended in some instances that in view of the fact that they were located in communities which contained residents who paid large income taxes to the Federal Government it would not lighten the burden so far as their communities were concerned.

Mr. REED. I did not see any such answer as that from Pennsylvania, but there might have been some.

Mr. President, in the first place, the evidence that is produced as to the necessity for Federal assistance to the local communities must always be scrutinized with especial care. We remember, because it was only last month, how strongly it was borne in upon us that the city of New York was on the verge of a financial collapse, and that there was nothing within its power to accomplish that would prevent it; and we were told that we must amend the emergency Reconstruction Finance Corporation bill in order to permit loans to municipalities, or on the following Wednesday the city of New York would be an admitted bankrupt, that it could not meet its obligations. We had the courage to stand up against that demand from that hard-pressed city.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. REED. I yield.

Mr. COPELAND. There is exactly the same need in New York for aid for our poor that there was when I was making the appeal to which the Senator has referred.

Mr. REED. Ah, but the Senator was not asking for aid for the poor; he was asking for aid for the city treasury to enable it to meet a lot of maturities that were coming on the following Wednesday.

Mr. COPELAND. Correct; and also that we must have larger sums than we could get by the ordinary methods of taxation with any means at our command if we were to have funds to do the relief work. And the same thing is true to-day. The city of New York is estopped from any effective means of taking care of its own poor because of the denial of the bankers of the necessary funds to take over the short-term obligations of the city.

Mr. REED. Precisely. The city made it very plain that it either had to borrow or receive a gift if it was going to meet its maturities, that it could not raise the money by taxation. We denied a loan from the Federal Government to the city, and immediately the city of New York so put its house in order that it was able to borrow from its own bankers $100,000,000 of new money to meet those coming maturities. It did put its house in order, and it did make the loan; and yet, if we had loaned the money, the house would not have been put in order.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Pennsylvania yield further to the Senator from New York?

Mr. REED. I yield.

Mr. COPELAND. I want to say that the amount of money which was advanced finally by the bankers at a usurious rate was quite insufficient to permit the city of New York to do what it desires to accomplish in the way of liberal appropriation for the poor of the city of New York.

Mr. REED. Of course the city of New York desires to go ahead with a program of $216,000,000 of public improvements and it can not afford to do it, and now the bankers say "No more improvements until that program is cut out."

Mr. COPELAND. And no more money to take care of the poor until the bankers' plan is adopted by the city.

Mr. REED. I am not sufficiently familiar with the terms of the quarrel between the bankers and the city administration of New York, but all I think is important is that the promised bankruptcy did not take place when we showed a firm stand against making a loan.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Pennsylvania yield to the Senator from Alabama?

Mr. REED. I yield.

Mr. BLACK. May I call the Senator's attention to a telegram which I received several days ago, not with any intention of interrupting his argument, but because I think it answers the question of the Senator from New York.

The city of Birmingham, Ala., a few days before the Senate voted against Senator COPELAND'S amendment, attempted to sell $400,000 worth of bonds for public improvements. I voted for Senator COPELAND'S amendment to the Reconstruction Finance Corporation bill, which would have authorized loans to cities. I have a telegram from the mayor of the city of Birmingham to the effect that Birmingham has not yet been able to sell those bonds, and urging that Federal legislation be passed aiding a solvent city to sell its bonds, and calling attention also to the fact that if Birmingham could sell its bonds, it would be able to place from 3,000 to 5,000 people to work in parks and other public works.

Mr. REED. I am quite sure that is so. I am quite sure the bonds of Birmingham will find a ready market if Birmingham can balance its budget and assure its creditors that they will get their payments as they fall due.

Mr. BLACK. I desire to state to the Senator that the Birmingham budget is balanced and its credit is unquestioned. It has never failed to pay one penny of any debt it owed. It can pay every dollar of those bonds if they can be sold, but it is impossible to sell them in the present situation. There has been no question raised about Birmingham's solvency or its ability to pay or its failure to live within its budget. The budget of the city of Birmingham is balanced, according to my information.

Mr. REED. In that case there is over $1,000,000,000 of hoarded currency in safety-deposit boxes that can be drawn out by any such securities as that. I do not mean to go into the details of Birmingham's finances, because I do not know one thing about them. I do know the trouble with the market for Federal bonds is that we have not balanced our Budget here in Washington. The trouble with the market for Philadelphia bonds is that Philadelphia has not balanced its budget. It is going to do it, and then the market for its bonds will revive. But neither they nor we nor anybody else nor any private industry is going to be able to sell its promise to pay until it balances its income with its outgo and makes its creditors realize that its debts are good.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Pennsylvania yield to the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. REED. I yield.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. How are those communities going to balance their budget if they are required to meet the staggering burden of relief of the unemployed and the needy in the present situation?

Mr. REED. That is for them to determine. It is just as easy for them to do it as it is for us to do it. How are we going to balance the Federal Budget? It looks now as if it is going to be about $1,750,000,000 out of the balance in the next fiscal year. How are we going to balance the Federal Budget when we add over three-quarters of a billion dollars to pay the expenditures required to be made by the bill that is pending here now?

I do not mean to make this a talk on finance, but it is perfectly obvious that the same problem that confronts us confronts the local communities, and vice versa, and it is not until we develop the spunk to balance our Budget and look facts in the face that we are going to see an end of the governmental difficulties in the money market.

Mr. COPELAND and Mr. LA FOLLETTE addressed the Chair.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Pennsylvania yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. REED. With the permission of Senators, I shall not yield to anyone for a few moments.

I say that, as I perceive the facts, the necessity for any such bill as the measure before us does not yet exist. We are told that this is the worst collapse in business and the worst depression that the country ever saw. I beg leave to doubt that. I doubt very much if the future looks as black to us now as it looked to our grandfathers in 1819, when not only America was prostrate and American commerce was dead but all Europe was prostrate as a result of Napoleon's war, just as she is prostrate to-day as the result Kaiser Wilhelm's war. The future looked just as black to the eyes of our ancestors as it looks to us now. Ahead of them then, although they did not know it, lay an era of good feeling, a period of commercial prosperity, and America came out from the clouds so fast that it almost took their breath away.

Then they speculated, as we have been doing, and they had a great inflation of commodity prices and security prices, and the whole business came tumbling down around their ears in 1838, and to those American Senators and Congressmen and business men who looked at conditions in 1837 it seemed as if the very bottom of everything had gone to smash. It looked just as black to them as it looks to us to-day.

It happened again in the fifties, and then came the panic of 1873. We think we have seen bank trouble in the last year or two. Why, Mr. President, in 1873 there was only one bank in the whole city of New York that was open for business. We do not know what trouble is compared with what our fathers faced in those days. Half of the country had been beaten flat by the War between the States. It did not seem to have any recuperative power. The North had lost in man power, had gone through all kinds of frenzied finance, and had gone off the gold standard, so that in terms of paper money gold dollars were selling at away above their nominal value.

All the calamities we have been dreading actually happened to our fathers in 1873. The bread lines were longer in proportion. Industry and commerce were more nearly dead. The suffering among our people was keener. The local welfare chests were nonexistent. All of this system of Red Cross and community relief which we have developed was unthought of. Here and there a single charitable individual gave of his means to keep some of his neighbors at work, but nothing was being done systematically as is the case to-day.

We do not know what depression is compared with our predecessors, who looked at the situation in America the day that Jay Cooke failed in Philadelphia. We do not know what hard times are compared with those men who kept their heads up and went on in those days and left us the matchless country that we have to-day. Just think of the contrast in conditions. To-day we have a population extremely literate, free of pestilence, free of any such disease or calamity of that nature as indicates a permanent decline in the power of our people. We have a country which in its financial aspect is unmatched. Its buildings, its factories, its railways, its wagon roads, were never equaled in the world before, and they are all just as good to-day as they were two years ago. We have an industrious population that not only knows how to work but is willing to work. Everything is sound in America, except we are all in a stew over a panic that can not last. People can not remain scared indefinitely. We are coming out of this depression just about as fast as we went into it. We need not tell ourselves that the present depression is unprecedented. It is not.

I am told by Mr. Gifford, of the President's commission, that in practically every State of the Union there exist organized relief establishments which are considered locally to be adequate to the task that confronts them. One of the exceptions that he suggested was my own State of Pennsylvania in which, as I have shown, Mr. President, half of the communities say they do not want a Federal appropriation. In Pennsylvania our difficulties are peculiar. Our legislature, about two months ago, passed a relief act which the governor held during the constitutional period for signing, and then allowed to become a law without signing it, and it is now tied up in the courts on the question of its constitutionality. But the legislature passed a perfectly adequate State relief act. I do not mean to go into the quarrel between the Governor of Pennsylvania and the legislature, but it is not the fault of the people of Pennsylvania, it is not the fault of the needy of Pennsylvania, and it is not the fault of the Federal Congress that that act is not in working order at this moment. Although it is not, the local communities say in spite of that that they can take care of themselves and that they do not want any Federal relief.

I suppose the State of Pennsylvania is about as badly hit as any one of the 48 States of the Union, because it is a great industrial State, and it has a shocking number of unemployed this minute. I suppose that Pennsylvania, in the matter of apportioning the relief according to the number of unemployed, would fare about as well as any other State in the Union. But Pennsylvania can fend for itself. It can keep order. It can take care of the cases of distress among its people, and it will do so. Pennsylvania sees no advantage in taking money away from the States to give back to them the next day for this purpose. We will raise the money ourselves. We have been raising it. We will keep on raising it. We do not want any Federal relief, even if we would profit by the terms of the bill.

One of the practical difficulties of the bill, if it were to pass, is that it would absolutely terminate all of that loyal work which is being done locally to meet the distress. It would absolutely put an end to every community chest effort. It would put an end to all appropriations by the cities and the counties and the States. They would all lean back and say, "Why should we work? The Federal Government is going to tax us anyhow. Let us wait and get our share from Washington."

Think of the effect upon the unemployed and the people in distress if by our legislation we so work it that all local charitable effort is suspended. We know that will happen. We have seen it before. We have seen it instantly when one of these proposals for a Federal grant comes before the Congress. We have seen the total slowing up of the community-cehst collections. I have heard men myself say over and over again, "Why should I give to the community chest when the Federal Government is going to raise my taxes for this same purpose? If I have to pay through the nose in taxes, that is all they are going to get out of me." I have heard that said over and over again. It is just human nature to say it. But as long as they are not confronted with that condition, as long as each community is challenged to take care of its own, that argument does not have any effect. We can raise by our community-fund plan a very much larger supply of funds than the Federal Government can possibly afford to spend.

What we do here in effect is to substitute a compulsory Federal collection instead of a local voluntary collection or in some cases a local exercise of the taxing power to meet local necessities. If the States and counties and cities had no taxing power, if we were the only authority in America that could compel the outpouring of funds to meet this necessity, I should say a strong argument existed for the bill; but our States have the taxing power and the borrowing power, and our counties and cities and local governments have it. There is no reason in the world why they should not use it for their local necessities instead of coming to us and requesting the exercise of the power that abides in us to compel levies to be made upon the citizens of the country.

Think how inequitable it is for a community—and there are many of them in all sections of the country—that has contributed generously to the alleviation of local suffering and distress to be penalized, as it is under this bill, for its very generosity, because the more people it has taken care of, the less unemployment there is within its borders, so much the less does it receive from the Federal Treasury under this bill. The community that will profit most by this bill is the community that has done the least.

Take the State of Mississippi. As I remember the figures, the Fifteenth Census showed that the percentage of unemployment in Mississippi was less than one-half of 1 per cent. Evidently that State has so provided for its people that unemployment was comparatively nonexistent there when the Fifteenth Census was taken. By contrast to that, my State of Pennsylvania showed a percentage that ran seven or eight times as high. When we come to this grant from the Federal Treasury, why should Mississippi be penalized in favor of Pennsylvania merely because by some method or other Mississippi has prevented suffering and we have not? If the people of Mississippi have used aggressive local methods of coping with this disaster and the people of Pennsylvania have not, they suffer for their intelligence and their energy and the people of Pennsylvania profit; and that is just the way it ought not to be.

Mr. President, I have only one more suggestion to make. When we come to the administration of relief it is self-evident that a local administrator can apportion relief more justly and more wisely than can any bureaucrat in Washington. The bill itself seems to recognize that when it provides that the administration shall be by local relief units, but subject to the guiding hand of a bureau here. We have witnessed enough of Washington bureaus to know that their guiding hands are usually resting on the brakes. Federal relief administered under this proposed act through the local authorities will merely be slowed up by the participation of the Federal authorities in the process. Let the unemployed of America be taken care of for as long as possible by the local authorities and the unemployed will benefit, because they will be accorded prompter and more intelligent relief than they possibly can obtain under the guidance of a bureaucrat sitting here in Washington.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The original text of the bill is open to further amendment. If there be no further amendment to it, the proposed substitute is open to amendment.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, I send an amendment to the desk, which I ask may be read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Maryland will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 4, line 9, of the pending substitute, after the word "thereof," it is proposed to insert the following: "shall transmit to the Secretary of the Treasury a joint resolution of the legislature of said State, properly certified, that (a) the amount requested is necessary for emergency relief in such State and can not be obtained either from public or private sources in said State; and (b) that the legislature and governor of said State consider any amount advanced in pursuance of such request as a loan only, and that the said State is morally bound to repay said sum so advanced," and to strike out all of lines 9, 10, 11, 12, and 13 after the word "thereof" in line 9 down to and including the word "sources" in line 13.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, the amendment is predicated upon the fact that if Federal money is to be made available it is to be used in the form of loans to the States in the event that loans are to be provided rather than direct gifts. It simply provides that the proper borrowing authorities of a State shall go on record—first, that the money is needed; second, that it can not be secured from either public or private sources; and, third, that they are morally bound to repay it as a loan.

Obviously, under some of the State constitutions it would be impossible for the States to borrow the money. So the word "legally" is not used, but instead the word "morally" is used, that being the only word that would fit the extraordinary conditions which now exist due to provisions in some of the State constitutions in the event such States want to borrow a sum of money from the Federal Government. Personally, I feel that we should keep the distribution of funds decentralized in the hands of local agencies; certainly so, at this stage of the crisis. If the depression is to go on indefinitely, if the number of unemployed is to increase, and the number of those who are hungry and in distress is to be augmented, eventually the Federal Government itself may have to enter the field and take over the local agencies in an effort to feed the people; but I, for one, do not believe that we should do that as an initial step.

The governor of my State, for example, has stated that Maryland is able to handle her own problem. It is not that we have not suffering; it is not that we have no unemployment; but our people are ready and willing, and have been able so far, to give as much help as the Federal Government could give, and, in fact, I believe better and more efficient service. If the Federal Government shall embark upon the policy of making direct loans for relief purposes to agencies in the States, in my judgment, community effort will be terminated. The men and women who are now contributing, some of them $10,000 a year, some $5,000 a year, and some $1,000 a year, are also large taxpayers, and when they are confronted with the specter of paying both to the Federal Government and to community funds, when the Federal Government embarks in this field, community relief funds will be very difficult to raise.

I might say that State bonds were sold in Maryland yesterday and brought 97 cents on the dollar; that is, the State received $97 for each $100 bond. It is because we have been self-reliant and managed our affairs well and can continue to do so that we would prefer to "run our own show" for the present, and believe that if governors of States want to borrow money from the Federal Government they should at least have the sanction of the representatives of the people of their States before the Federal Government should be called upon to make the loans.

The argument may be advanced that the legislatures of the States are not in session, and that it would be expensive to call them in session. I believe, however, that the members of the legislature in every State in the Union, were they called in session for this purpose, would gladly give a day of their time without pay. They could meet and quickly pass a resolution, if it were desired that one be passed, setting forth in effect that they could not get the money from public sources, that they could not get it from private sources, that funds were greatly needed, and that they were making a loan which they would repay when times were better. If we are to provide for loans we should provide for loans; if we are not to provide for loans but for gifts, the gifts should be direct without any semblance of loan language thrown around them such as is found in the provisions of the bill. As it stands now, the money advanced would not be a loan, because a governor would have no moral or legal right to borrow from the Federal Treasury; and, if a governor is to borrow, I submit that the legislatures should support his action, so that the entire State, through its legally constituted representatives, may in due form and on paper be represented as making the request and recognizing the moral obligation to repay the loan when times shall improve.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Maryland to the amendment in the nature of a substitute.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, I sincerely hope that the amendment offered by the Senator from Maryland will not be adopted. In the situation which confronts the country speed is the essence of things. If we are to do anything for the unemployed and for those who are in need of food, relief must be given now. The amendment would add to the machinery; it would involve long delay, as legislatures would have to be called in session, and then there might be bickering in the legislatures, and in a State such as mine very great difficulty would be caused.

Only recently my State appropriated $20,000,000 for relief, and then, because of a difference of opinion between Governor Roosevelt, on the one hand, and the Republican legislature, on the other, only yesterday the legislature lopped off $21,000,000 for public works for which plans had been made.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Maryland?

Mr. COPELAND. I will yield in just a moment. In other words, the legislature gave $20,000,000 with one hand and grabbed it back and in addition another million with the other hand. I think it would be most unfortunate to adopt the amendment now proposed. If we are to do this thing at all, we should do it promptly. If we are going to involve it in machinery so that the good effect will be delayed, we might as well give up in the beginning. I sincerely hope that the amendment will not be agreed to. I now yield to the Senator from Maryland.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, first of all, the Legislature of the State of New York is now in session, and therefore, so far as the Senator's argument applies to his own State, the legislature would not have to be called together. Second, if the legislature of his State, elected by the people, saw fit to lop off $21,000,000 for public works, I do not see why the Federal Government should make that State a loan, because it stands to reason that the State's representatives assembled in the legislature do not want to do what the State's Representatives in the United States Senate want to do.

Mr. COPELAND. I want to say, Mr. President, that in voting for the measure before us I think I am entirely truthful in saying that I am not thinking about my State. The whole amount involved is $375,000,000. New York has one-tenth of the population of the country. If we were to get one-tenth of the appropriation, we would receive $37,000,000. The city of New York, where unemployment is so common, contains half the population of the State; so ultimately it would get $18,000,000, and one-third of it, or $6,000,000, this year. We have already spent $50,000,000 in my city. The $6,000,000 we would get from this bill would be a mere bagatelle. I think that I am standing on loftier ground than to have my attitude influenced by the mere thought of what may be done for the city of New York and the suffering people of that city—and God knows there are many there. I am thinking about other States and other communities and other sections of our country, where there are hungry women and babies; and I myself am not content, Mr. President, to have the machinery become so complicated as that it will be springtime or the 4th of July before any good effects may come from the operation of this bill and the relief proposed by it.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, the Senator from New York conjures up images that I am afraid do not exist. No machinery at all is created in this amendment. As a matter of fact, it provides, inferentially at least, that the State agencies shall spend the relief if they borrow the sum of money; and certainly, in my judgment, the State agency in New York is much better equipped and qualified to spend New York's share of its relief money than a Federal agency is, any time and any day.

The legislature of that State is in session now. If they want the money, they could pass this resolution the day after the bill becomes law and get their share of the money and spend it the next day, and so could the legislature of any other State in the Union; whereas under the bill that the Senator would support the governor could not get the money, because he would first have to make his appeal to the bureau of the Federal Government, which, in turn, has a right to investigate the conditions in New York and to select the agencies to spend the money before the people of his State could get a single dollar.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. TYDINGS. Yes; I yield.

Mr. COPELAND. Does the Senator imply that I will not vote for the Democratic substitute?

Mr. TYDINGS. No; but if the Senator is going to vote for the Democratic substitute—namely, for a loan in preference to a direct gift to some agency in his State—may I ask the Senator, in all good faith, how the Governor of New York can borrow money from the Treasury of the United States; what authority he has to do it?

Mr. COPELAND. He has not any authority; but, let me say, that if the Governor of the State of New York takes advantage of the opportunity and makes application for this fund, the State of New York will repay any money that it receives.

Mr. TYDINGS. That may be true; but, let me also point out to my friend from New York that many governors may refuse to borrow money which may be needed by their States, because they will feel themselves unable to borrow it unless they have the sanction of the legislature so to do. There are many governors of States in this country who would not feel that upon their initiative they could petition the Federal Government for a share of the funds provided in this bill. They would want the sanction of the legislatures, because in almost every State the borrowing power of the people and of every one in that State, so far as I know, is lodged in the legislature; and without these resolutions on the part of the respective legislatures of the States, in my judgment, many governors who would like to borrow will feel that they are powerless so to do.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Maryland further yield to the Senator from New York?

Mr. TYDINGS. Yes; I yield to the Senator.

Mr. COPELAND. I should like to say that I regard this great epidemic in the same way that I would regard an invasion of the country by bubonic plague, or typhus, or smallpox. No sort of political philosophy can stand up in the face of human distress. If the Senator is going to hesitate and split hairs and try to formulate legislation which will suit his sort of political philosophy, that is his privilege; but, so far as I am concerned, I am not satisfied to know that there are millions of children in the United States who are going to suffer from undernourishment, that disease will prevail as a result of our failure to go forward because of our fear that we are going to establish a precedent which will come home to damn us. I am content to go forward and to let the future take care of itself so far as political philosophies are concerned.

Mr. TYDINGS. The Senator is not going forward; he is standing still when he opposes this amendment, because, by his own admission, he states that the Governor of New York is without the slightest authority to borrow a single dollar that the Congress provides. The Governor of New York can borrow the money if the legislature authorizes him so to do. What I am trying to do is to put the Senator's State in a position where it can get the money in the proper and legitimate way.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Maryland yield to the Senator from Kentucky?

Mr. TYDINGS. I yield to the Senator from Kentucky.

Mr. BARKLEY. What will be the situation in States, of which there are many, where even the legislature can not borrow money, where there must be a vote of the people before there can be a borrowing of money on the part of the State? In that sort of a State, under the Senator's amendment, there would be no possibility of getting any of this fund for relief until a popular election has been held to determine whether or not the money shall be borrowed.

Mr. TYDINGS. Oh, no; the Senator is mistaken. He has not read my amendment.

Mr. BARKLEY. If I am mistaken, I should like to be corrected.

Mr. TYDINGS. Oh, yes; the Senator is mistaken. Where there are States which can not borrow through their legislature or their governor, as the case may be, but where a vote of all the people is required, in that case my amendment simply provides that the legislature shall make the certificate stated in the amendment, although it may not be legally binding, that they feel that their State is morally bound by the act; so that the Senator's contention would not hold.

Mr. BARKLEY. There can be no moral obligation where the people themselves must vote upon a proposition before there can be a legal obligation——

Mr. TYDINGS. Oh, yes; there can be.

Mr. BARKLEY. And where the constitution prohibits either the State legislature or the governor, or the two of them combined, from indulging in the pleasure of borrowing money from any source.

Mr. TYDINGS. I can prove that the Senator's ground is not well taken there, and I will cite an illustration. An infant is not legally liable for the debts he creates, but he is morally liable for the debts he creates. You can not sue one under 21 years of age and legally collect for a hundred dollars you may have let him have in the form of a loan, but he is morally bound to repay you the money.

Mr. BARKLEY. There is quite a difference between the moral obligation of an infant who may have property and who may come of age after a while, upon the termination of which situation he may assume as an adult the obligation to pay it, and the situation of a State where the people must vote at the polls before any sort of obligation can be incurred. In that sort of case, if they vote against incurring the obligation, of course there is no moral liability or legal liability either.

Mr. TYDINGS. Of course; but the Senator must know that where it is necessary first for the people of a State to vote before money can be borrowed, the governor can not borrow it.

Mr. BARKLEY. No.

Mr. TYDINGS. But is it not a better case if, in addition to the governor's request, he is supported by a resolution of both branches of the legislature saying that they want to borrow the money? At least in that case you have gotten all of the legislative representatives of the people, as well as their executive officer, to make the request.

Mr. BARKLEY. It seems to me that the Senator's amendment puts a restriction around obtaining this money that can never be eliminated. Take a legislature, for instance, that is in session now, where there is real need for this relief, where there can be not a dollar of it borrowed except after an affirmative vote of the people. Suppose the legislature passed the sort of resolution the Senator has in mind that it should pass in order to obtain this money, which is almost an obligation later to submit that proposal to the people for a popular vote to determine whether the State shall issue its bonds to the Federal Government for the amount of the loan.

Mr. TYDINGS. The Senator has it wrong.

Mr. BARKLEY. Suppose, upon the holding of that plebescite, the people vote against it. Then where are they, and where is the Federal Government, and where are the bonds, and where is the money?

Mr. TYDINGS. Let me answer the Senator's question by asking him one.

Mr. BARKLEY. Do not make it too hard.

Mr. TYDINGS. How are the people going to repudiate the action of a governor who borrows the money without their consent or approval?

Mr. BARKLEY. It is no more a repudiation of the act of the governor for the people to vote against obligating themselves at some future time to pay money than it is a repudiation of the act of a constitutional convention that writes a constitution for a State and submits it to the people for the people to vote against it. The people, of course, will exercise their sovereign right when they vote on it, regardless of whatever the governor may have said.

Mr. TYDINGS. But the Senator evades the point.

Mr. BARKLEY. I do not mean to.

Mr. TYDINGS. Certainly the people, if they can repudiate the legislature—as I admit they can—can also repudiate the governor.

Mr. BARKLEY. Yes.

Mr. TYDINGS. But at least the loan is more binding if the legislative representatives of the State in session assembled have gone on record as wanting the loan, and the governor transmits that expression to the Secretary of the Treasury, than if he does it of his own accord, without the support of the legislature.

Mr. BARKLEY. I doubt very seriously whether any moral obligation can be attributed to the people, under such circumstances as those, by any action or resolution that may be passed by the legislature. That is the difficulty about the Senator's amendment.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Maryland yield to the Senator from Oklahoma?

Mr. TYDINGS. Yes; I yield to the Senator.

Mr. GORE. I desire to ask the Senator from Maryland if there is nothing in this bill that undertakes to compel a reluctant or ungrateful State to accept these unsolicited loans, whether they want them or whether they need them or not.

Mr. TYDINGS. That is true.

Mr. GORE. I do not think a sovereign State ought to be left free to refuse to be ravished by our generosity. [Laughter.]

Mr. TYDINGS. All I want to say in conclusion, Mr. President, is that it does seem to me that to pass this bill, and leave it up to a governor to borrow money on his own idea of things, without the support of the legislature which was elected for that purpose, is bad business. So far as I am concerned, I think without some provision of this kind in the bill we might as well make a direct gift to the governor, to spend as he sees fit.

Mr. BULKLEY. Mr. President, the amendment offered by the Senator from Maryland adds a complication to the operation of this amendment, and by his own confession it does not accomplish the purpose of securing an obligation that is binding upon the States.

There can be no possible doubt that if any State accepts an advancement under the terms of the pending amendment, there will be a moral obligation created; and I do not believe that any State will so accept and later repudiate the obligation.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Maryland?

Mr. BULKLEY. Yes.

Mr. TYDINGS. The Senator, however, must remember that it is not the State that accepts the money, but the governor of the State.

Mr. BULKLEY. The governor does not accept the money personally. He accepts it for the benefit of the State, and in my opinion it would be so recognized.

The Senator is concerned lest some governor might be afraid to make the certificate required by the pending amendment without the support of a vote of his legislature. Of course the Senator knows that there is nothing in our amendment to prevent any governor from calling his legislature into session if he needs such support. Wherever conditions are such that the governor feels that the support of the legislature or the advice of the legislature is necessary, he may call a session; and that will not contravene anything that is provided in the pending substitute amendment.

I hope the amendment of the Senator from Maryland will be voted down.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Maryland [Mr. TYDINGS] to the amendment in the nature of a substitute.

On a division, the amendment to the amendment was rejected.

Mr. MORRISON. Mr. President, I offer the amendment to the substitute, which I send to the desk.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment to the amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. The Senator from North Carolina offers the following amendment to the substitute:

On page 1, line 3, of said amendment strike out "$375,000,000" and insert "$125,000,000."

On page 1, line 3, strike out "one-third of."

On page 2, strike out all after the word "purposes" in line 3 down to and including the numerals "1932" in line 4.

On page 3, line 10, strike out "$375,000,000" and insert "$125,000,000."

On page 3, line 10, strike out "one-third of."

On page 3, strike out all after the period following the word "provided" down to and including the period following the numerals "1932" in line 14.

Mr. MORRISON. Mr. President, the amendment provides for the expenditure of $250,000,000 between now and the 30th of next June for the two relief purposes mentioned in the bill. One hundred and twenty-five million can be expended for unemployment relief through loans to the States, and $125,000,000 for public roads. I would like to see both of those things done. But, beyond that, after June 30, the bill authorizes the expenditure of $500,000,000, twice as much as will be expended during what we hope is the crisis in this terrible condition growing out of unemployment.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, is the Senator's amendment to the original bill, or is it an amendment to the substitute?

Mr. MORRISON. The amendment, when offered to the original bill, was disposed of, unfortunately. I am now offering it to the Black-Bulkley-Walsh substitute pursuant to previous notice.

We would expend between now and June 30, next, $250,000,000 under my amendment and beyond that we would not at this time legislate.

Mr. President, I do not desire to repeat what I said on a similar amendment to the original bill, but I do want to urge the unwisdom of dealing with an emergency situation by annual legislation. We are not able to see beyond June 30, next, for our distressed country. Some gentlemen prophesy that conditions will grow worse; some, that conditions will grow better. None of us know. But for one, I hope that conditions will be very much better. The arrival of the summer alone will make them much better than they are now. The relief measures we are enacting almost daily here promise to me great relief to the industries of our country, from which the jobs men have lost must be recovered.

Mr. President, the great industries of the country ought to be considered, certainly to an extent, because it is by them that unemployment must be banished, if it is to be banished from our country at all. The country lives in daily dread of destructive taxation through enactments by Congress and the legislatures of the States of the Union.

Why appropriate to relieve distress in this emergency which can only be prophesied to exist after June 30, or authorize the expenditure of $500,000,000, which could and may be expended under conditions which none of us would consider of such emergency as to warrant the Congress of the United States levying taxation upon the people of this country to pay if we could know now those conditions?

I myself can not conceive of our legislating for an emergency in this manner. I am willing to go to the extent that I think necessary to relieve the distress, and not split hairs too much about how we do it, but I am not willing to vote to authorize the expenditure to be followed by appropriations of $500,000,000 in the distressed situation of the taxpayers of this country to relieve distress beyond June 30 next, because I hope, and I think with as much reason as anybody has to fear to the contrary, that by that time this condition will have at least been so alleviated as that we will not be required to resort to emergency legislation for its relief.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from North Carolina to the substitute.

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I offer an amendment, on page 5 of the substitute, to strike out the proviso in lines 7 to 11 and ask to have inserted what I send to the desk. Let me say that it is exactly the same amendment that was offered to the original bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment to the amendment will be reported.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 5, the Senator from Tennessee proposes to strike out the proviso commencing on line 7 and going to line 11 and to insert the following:

Provided, That in any State where no state-wide board of charities exists or no special emergency organization has been set up the amount allotted to any such State shall be distributed by the action of the governor and the State board constituted for controlling the financial affairs of such State, if such board exists, and if it does not exist by the governor.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment to the amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ODDIE. Mr. President, I send to the desk an amendment to the substitute and ask that it be read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be reported.

The CHIEF CLERK. The Senator from Nevada proposes to add at the end of section 2 the following proviso:

Provided, That of the sum authorized to be appropriated by section 1 hereof it shall be discretionary with the Secretary of Agriculture from time to time to apportion not to exceed $9,000,000 in accordance with the provisions of the second paragraph of section 3 of the Federal highway act, as amended June 24, 1930, and to expend the sum so apportioned in accordance therewith; he also may, in his discretion, from time to time apportion not to exceed the sum of $37,500,000 for carrying out the provisions of section 23 of the Federal highway act, as amended and supplemented.

Mr. ODDIE. Mr. President, under the Federal-aid highway acts for a number of years past 10 per cent of the amount appropriated each year, roughly, has been allocated to roads in the national forests. This amendment of mine gives the Secretary of Agriculture authority to allocate the same proportionate amount of the $375,000,000 to be authorized for Federal-aid roads in sections 1 and 2 of the substitute amendment under discussion.

In 1930 Congress passed what is called the public domain amendment to the Federal-aid highway act. It has appropriated in the last year $3,000,000 for the building of roads on the unappropriated public domain under the authority of this amendment. On the same basis this amendment provides for the authorization of the same proportionate amount of the $375,000,000 for Federal-aid roads in sections 1 and 2 of this substitute amendment.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, this authorization is supposed to be an emergency authorization on account of unemployment. I am wondering whether there is any large amount of unemployment in the national parks.

Mr. ODDIE. Mr. President, there is a large amount of unemployment in the States in which the national forests are located, and I feel that it will be just as important in relieving the unemployment problem to provide for this allocation by adopting this amendment as it will be in other sections of the country.

Mr. BARKLEY. What is the character of the unemployment that exists in the national parks?

Mr. ODDIE. In numbers of the Western States there are national forests, and there is just as much unemployment in proportion in those sections of the country as will be found in the more thickly populated sections.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, I think the Senator from Kentucky is under a misapprehension. This does not relate to roads in the national parks at all, but it relates to roads in the national forests.

Mr. BARKLEY. In the national forests there is probably still less unemployment than in the national parks. I am not advised that there is any great congestion of population in the national forests which would conduce to unemployment.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. The Senator speaks from lack of acquaintance with the actual situation. The work on roads in the national forests draws from the adjacent territory that is without the forests.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment to the amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ODDIE. Mr. President, I send to the desk another amendment to the second section.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Let it be reported.

The CHIEF CLERK. The Senator from Nevada proposes to amend on page 5, between lines 8 and 9, by inserting the following new paragraph:

> Any amount to which a State is entitled under the provisions of this section may, at the option of the State and upon request of the governor thereof, be expended for the purposes provided for in section 2 and under the same terms and conditions as are applicable in the case of expenditure of funds appropriated pursuant to the authorization contained in section 1.

Mr. ODDIE. Mr. President, this amendment would place an option in the hands of the governor to either accept the money as a loan, as provided for in the substitute, or to use it for public-road building purposes.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President, I did not understand the effect of the amendment.

Mr. ODDIE. The effect is to give the governor of each State the option of accepting the money as a loan, as provided in the second portion of the substitute, or of using it for road-building purposes, as provided in sections 1 and 2 of the substitute.

Mr. BLACK. My judgment is that it could be done anyhow.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, I was about to make the same remark as that made by the Senator from Alabama.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment to the amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

Mr. WAGNER. Mr. President, I desire to offer an amendment, which I do not think will be opposed by the sponsors of the bill. It changes the allocation of the 40 per cent provided for under the La Follette-Costigan bill from the basis of "population" to "unemployment" census. I think it is a much fairer distribution, because under it the assistance would go where there is the greatest need to relieve unemployment. I may explain that wherever the word "population" appears I have substituted the word "unemployment," so that the allocation is according to the unemployment census rather than the census of population.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, will the Senator be willing to let the amendment go over until to-morrow?

Mr. WAGNER. Certainly.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the pending bill and the pending substitute may be reprinted together with the amendments which have been agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

THE PROHIBITION QUESTION

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. President, the other day the junior Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE] asked to have printed in the RECORD a statement by Bishop Richardson. I regret that I did not hear him at the time he asked it, but I read his request afterwards. Since then I have procured the statement of Bishop Richardson and now ask that it may be printed in the RECORD at this point as a part of my remarks.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The statement is as follows:

ANTI-SALOON LEADER FAVORS STATE VOTE—BISHOP RICHARDSON CONFIDENT OF OUTCOME; HITS NATIONAL REFERENDUM IDEA

The new head of the Anti-Saloon League sees no objection to a prohibition referendum if the vote is confined to the separate States and is not made nation-wide.

Confident of the result, Bishop Ernest G. Richardson looks upon the polls of the voters by the various States as the best means of settling the issue of repeal of the eighteenth amendment. Richardson is head of the Philadelphia area of the Methodist Episcopal Church.

"When a majority of the people in three-fourths of the States," he said yesterday, "favor repeal of the amendment, then let it go. That is the only constitutional way to proceed."

A national referendum to Richardson's mind would be "meaningless," no matter what the popular result, because of the constitutional proviso requiring 36 States to vote for repeal before that could be accomplished.

He said he did not believe a majority of the people of the Nation would vote for repeal. But if they did or not, he added, it would not be fair to permit the voters in a dozen States to write the law for the entire Nation.

"If it had not been for the combining of the Colonies on equal status we would have no United States to-day," he said, adding, "It's just as important to have equal representation of the States on the prohibition question as it is for them to have equal representation in the Senate."

"That's the foundation of our Government," he said.

Richardson said he believes every State "should settle its own problem" on national repeal through a referendum of its own citizens.

Saying he never before attended a meeting of the league, the new president asserted he was not acquainted with its activities and could make no promises as to future policies other than to urge "harmony of effort" with other prohibition organizations.

A stanch defender of the dry cause, he said he did not believe "too much" was being spent on enforcement, and more funds should be used "if necessary."

EXECUTIVE SESSION

Mr. McNARY. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business.

EXECUTIVE MESSAGES

Messages in writing from the President of the United States transmitting nominations were laid before the Senate and referred to the appropriate committees.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES

Mr. ODDIE, from the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, reported favorably the nominations of sundry postmasters, which were placed on the Executive Calendar.

NOTIFICATION TO THE PRESIDENT

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, on yesterday I asked unanimous consent that the President be notified of the advice and consent of the Senate to the nominations of Ogden L. Mills to be Secretary of the Treasury and Arthur A. Ballantine to be Under Secretary of the Treasury. At the time the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] objected. I have been promised by him that if I would bring up the matter to-day he would have no further objection to the request. I therefore renew my request that the President be notified of the advice and consent of the Senate to the nominations referred to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, the Senator from Utah came to see me to-day about my objection made on yesterday. I understand it is desirable that these gentlemen be installed in their respective offices in order that there may be no interference with a prearranged high-class social function. Of course, I do not want to interfere with anything of that nature, so I withdraw my objection.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the President will be notified that the Senate advises and consents to the nominations.

THE CALENDAR—FEDERAL FARM BOARD

The Chief Clerk read sundry nominations for the Federal Farm Board.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, in the absence of the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. NORBECK], I ask that the nominations may go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The nominations will be passed over. That completes the calendar.

RECESS

Mr. McNARY. As in legislative session, I move that the Senate recess until 12 o'clock noon to-morrow.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate (at 5 o'clock and 5 minutes p. m.) took a recess until to-morrow, Friday, February 12, 1932, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

THURSDAY, FEBRUARY 11, 1932

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Merciful Lord God, how marvelous it is to know that the One who rules the universe has human sympathy. We bow before the God who is enthroned above all gods, and He will give us pity and help—infinitely wise and powerful, yet tenderly, lovingly, and compassionately human. We thank Thee with all our hearts. Thou hast answered the world-wide cry in the gift of Thine only begotten Son, our Savior. The highest measure of man is to be like Him. Help us to open the gates of our whole spiritual being to Him, that a new face, a new love, and a new life may enter in. O Son of man and Brother of the races of earth, come forth and be the teacher of this old world. As it grows older may it not abandon the faith, the hope, the instruction of our fathers. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

ABRAHAM LINCOLN

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, I want to present a unanimous-consent request. I ask unanimous consent that to-morrow, Lincoln's birthday, after the disposition of business on the Speaker's table, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CHIPERFIELD] may have 40 minutes to address the House on the life and character of Abraham Lincoln.

I have consulted the majority leader with regard to this request.

Mr. RAINEY. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, and I shall not object, we have been objecting to similar special orders heretofore, but the condition of the business of the House is such that we can listen to the speech to-morrow of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CHIPERFIELD] and still get through with the business arranged for this week. Therefore, I shall not object, with the understanding that this does not constitute a precedent.

Mr. SNELL. That is what I had understood from the gentleman.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

THE GOLD STANDARD

Mr. BUSBY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 10 minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Mississippi?

There was no objection.

Mr. BUSBY. Mr. Speaker, for some time a number of the Members of the House have been hoping we might have an opportunity to discuss some propositions that we feel are very fundamental in relation to the currency system of this country.

Our country to-day stands with property values reduced from $400,000,000,000 to $300,000,000,000 within a period of two and a half years. The national income of our country has dropped from $90,000,000,000 to less than $60,000,000,000 in two years. There is a reason for all this having happened, and I want to tell you that mere legislative palliatives such as have been proposed by the President and the administration and the leaders in Congress are not going to meet the situation.

The Federal reserve system is a great institution, but it deals with credits only. It is a credit machine and applies at the outskirts of business. Of course, it can have something to do with the control of business by touching instances here and there, in a disorganized sort of way, but it does not reach the basic trouble.

What I am interested in is the gold standard and in making the gold standard serve business and not business having to bow to the gold standard every time a crisis occurs.

The gold standard can be used—and should be used—as an elastic base whereby the values of commodities can be measured. Any man who is in business, any man who is producing, any man who labors, can get commodities, but who can get gold at the present time? Why, the gold supply of the world amounts to $11,300,000,000, we are told. The United States needs $2,400,000,000 to stabilize its currency and it has $4,500,000,000 in gold. France needs $1,100,000,000 to stabilize its currency and it has $3,000,000,000 in gold. The two countries have $7,500,000,000 of the world's gold supply when they only need $3,500,000,000. In other words, $4,000,000,000 of gold is hoarded and housed by the United States and France and is doing no sort of service to help us out in this situation. It is not stabilizing our currency.

Four countries of the entire commercial world are on the full gold standard and there are more than 50 countries that are engaged in international commerce.

The gold standard under the present arrangement has played out. It is not meeting the situation and you folks who are selling wheat now at 50 cents a bushel when you made contracts on the basis of $2 wheat know what I am talking about. The people down my way who are selling cotton for $25 a bale when in 1926 they made contracts and issued bonds on cotton at $100 a bale know what I am talking about.

I have asked for this time, not to make the speech I want to make to this House but I wanted this time in order that we might have some understanding and make some arrangement for time in which the gentlemen of this House might express themselves and really discuss the subject to which I am alluding.

I am sorry that the leader is not on the floor because I wanted to talk with him and also the Speaker, but I see they are both gone. You know that I happen to be on the Committee on Banking and Currency. I have not seen my chairman here in several days. I never served on a committee before where one man was the whole committee. He is out, he is conferring with the President, he is conferring with gentlemen who are settling these things, but they get nowhere. For one, I think Congress ought to be entitled to discuss these matters. I think my committee is the right place to begin, and for one I am ready to go. [Applause.]

Mr. SANDLIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BUSBY. I yield.

Mr. SANDLIN. Does the gentleman have any information with reference to what took place yesterday?

Mr. BUSBY. I have only such information as the press carries. It is another one of those complete settlements for our dilemma which will not settle the situation because it does not strike right.

I want to say to the Congress that I have never been a militant sort of Member, but we are going to have some discussion on the floor of this House on the subject to which I am alluding, and I do not mean maybe. [Applause.]

I want to say to the membership of the House and to the Speaker and to the leaders that I am entitled to speak for the people of my district. I have sat around waiting and waiting while my people have suffered and suffered, and we have not opened our mouths on the subject so vital to them.

Mr. RAMSEYER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BUSBY. I yield to the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. RAMSEYER. I know what the gentleman from Mississippi is driving at, and I am in entire sympathy with what he is trying to accomplish. There are a number of gentlemen on this side of the aisle who agree with him on this problem of money stabilization.

Yesterday morning I stated to a few Members on this side of the aisle that I would to-day ask unanimous consent to address the House on next Tuesday on this proposition, but in view of what afterwards transpired yesterday, and the information carried in the newspapers that another administration bill on money and credit had been agreed on with the support of both parties, and furthermore that such a bill will likely come up for consideration the first of next week, I am going to defer my own request until a later date. I do not want to do anything to interfere in the least with the consideration of the proposed measure. That is all I care to say now, but I want the gentleman to know that there are many Members in this House on both sides of the aisle that agree with him and who want early consideration of the monetary stabilization bills.

Mr. SANDLIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAMSEYER. I yield.

Mr. SANDLIN. The gentleman knows that I have discussed the matter with him, and the means of passing the legislation proposed. Does the gentleman have any hope that the legislation proposed yesterday will bring results?

Mr. RAMSEYER. It is another step in the right direction which has got to be followed by the program that the gentleman from Mississippi has in mind in order to afford permanent relief.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BUSBY. I will yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. The gentleman from Mississippi has made a very useful and courageous statement, and I hope it will have its desired effect. As the gentleman knows, under present conditions these programs are being conducted by a few bankers of New York City, whom I could name.

Mr. BUSBY. I am cognizant of the fact that the gentleman from New York has stated. I know it is not the masses of the people that are telling the administration what kind of a program to put before this Congress. [Applause.] I know that we, as the representatives of the people, are entitled to have our say on the floor of this House, and I know that we should persist and demand—and if we do not we are taking a cowardly attitude—a hearing on this subject. [Applause.]

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from South Carolina asks unanimous consent to address the House for five minutes.

Mr. PATTERSON. Reserving the right to object, and I am not going to object, this day has been set aside as a special order for the Private Calendar.

Mr. STEVENSON. I just wanted to say a word in behalf of the chairman of the committee.

Mr. BUSBY. Will the gentleman withhold his request for one minute?

Mr. STEVENSON. Yes.

Mr. BUSBY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for two additional minutes, in order to get some information.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Mississippi?

There was no objection.

Mr. BUSBY. I want to say to the leader of the majority party that I have discussed very briefly the question of setting apart next Tuesday under some procedure for general debate, so that we might have an opportunity to discuss the question that I raised here to-day. I wonder if the leader can give us any assurance whether we can have that time, and when we can get it.

Mr. RAINEY. I will say to the gentleman that on next Tuesday we hope to have up one of the supply bills. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. OLIVER] will be in charge of the bill on the Democratic side. If that does not appeal to the gentleman, we may perhaps later on, when there is no supply bill in the way, devote an entire day to these speeches.

Mr. BUSBY. We have been put off from day to day, and I do not like the expression "these speeches." That ordinarily refers to campaign speeches. The speeches I hope will be made will be service speeches for the country and the people who are so sorely distressed at the present time, and I for one am going to insist that we have time in which to discuss this subject and give such views to the country as we may have on the monetary subject. If they are worth anything, let us adopt them. If not, that will end it.

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from South Carolina?

There was no objection.

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. Speaker, with reference to one or two statements that have been made in regard to this subject in the discussion that has just been had, I desire to enter protest, in behalf of the chairman of our committee, the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. STEAGALL], who does not assume to be the whole committee. I think my friend did not mean to convey that impression, but that was the impression which the gentleman conveyed when the gentleman said he did not know, but that one man constituted the whole committee and that that gentleman was not accessible. I think my friend did not mean that.

Mr. BUSBY. I did not say that at all. I said I had never served on a committee before where the membership had no active part in the plans and proceedings, and I have not.

Mr. STEVENSON. The gentleman used the expression "where one man was the committee." I do not know to what gentleman the gentleman from Mississippi referred.

Mr. BUSBY. I did not mean to criticize him, but it is simply a situation that everybody in the House knows about and that I can not apologize for, because I state the truth.

Mr. STEVENSON. Well, I just desire to say that I do not think the committee generally concedes that its rights have been assumed or abrogated by the chairman of the committee. One other thing, that is the designation of the proceedings that have been had and in which I have had no participation, though I probably would have if I had been in the city, as star-chamber proceedings. This country is in a pretty bad shape, generally recognized, and the President of the United States and his advisers are doing what they think is the proper thing to pull it out. When they call into conference men who are supposed to be the leaders on both sides in an endeavor to do that I do not think it is very graceful to speak of it as a star-chamber proceeding.

Mr. RAMSEYER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEVENSON. I yield.

Mr. RAMSEYER. Of course, the gentleman's committee has not conducted hearings for several weeks. Members of his committee may have been busy on something else. The gentleman also knows that all three of the large national farm organizations have been here and are here now anxious to be heard on this problem of monetary stabilization. Can the gentleman give the House any idea as to when those interested in legislation on monetary stabilization will be given a hearing before his committee?

Mr. STEVENSON. I have no control over those things at all. There have been no requests made to me to permit a hearing before that committee.

Mr. RAMSEYER. Requests have been made addressed to the chairman of the committee of which the gentleman is a member, and it may be the gentleman does not know anything about it, but repeated requests have been made by the farm organizations to the chairman of the Committee on Banking and Currency, and I think that committee should have a meeting and set a date very soon for such hearings.

Mr. STEVENSON. Now, I can not yield further to receive a lecture. The gentleman knows that that committee rewrote the Reconstruction Finance Corporation bill and passed it in a little over three weeks, and it has not been very long since it came out of conference.

Mr. RAMSEYER. It has been three weeks since that bill came out of conference.

Mr. RAINEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for one minute.

The SPEAKER. Without objection it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. RAINEY. I understood from the gentleman and from others that more than one gentleman was prepared and anxious to address the House on the subject of monetary stabilization. We would all be glad to hear those addresses. However, I do not think we ought to sidetrack an appropriation bill in order to hear those addresses, important as they are and interesting as I know they will be. I can assure the gentleman that I will be glad to cooperate later on when there is no appropriation bill in the way to give an entire day to the discussion of this important subject, so as to give it a place on the program and give it the dignity which it ought to have. I know these will not be partisan speeches. But next Tuesday, if the appropriation bill is under consideration, I think the gentlemen should get time under general debate.

Mr. BUSBY. What I wanted to say was that the appropriations that are being dealt with now can not be used until the beginning of the next fiscal year, which is July 1, and people all over the country are suffering and starving now, and they can not hold out until next July.

Mr. RAINEY. That may be true, but I think we ought to proceed with the business of Congress as rapidly as possible.

Mr. BUSBY. Well, that is the business of Congress, and I think a very vital business, and if we sit here all spring and settle that proposition correctly, we will have done a good job.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. Speaker, a point of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. SIMMONS. It occurs to some of us on the Republican side that this argument between the Democratic Members should be settled in the Speaker's chambers.

Mr. BUSBY. That is old stuff, Mr. Speaker.

MEMBERSHIP, COMMITTEE ON MILITARY AFFAIRS

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Speaker, I offer a privileged resolution.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia offers a privileged resolution, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

House Resolution 139

Resolved, That Mr. PAUL J. KVALE be, and he is hereby, elected to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. KVALE] is a member of several other committees. Military Affairs is an exclusive committee. The gentleman will resign his membership from the other committees.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

THE FISCAL SITUATION

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 10 minutes on the fiscal situation in connection with the new tax bill.

Mr. BACHMANN. Mr. Speaker, I shall not object, but reserving the right to object, I will say that this date has been set aside for the Private Calendar. There are many Members here who are interested in a number of private bills, and I hope there will not be any further requests. If there are, I shall be obliged to object to them.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will assist the gentleman in that regard. The Chair will not recognize any other Member to make such a request.

Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Georgia?

There was no objection.

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Speaker, I am interested in the Private Calendar, and it is with regret that I ask you to give me 10 minutes of that time to present to you a picture that I think both the membership and the country are entitled to have.

The Ways and Means Committee is confronted with the most difficult problem that any committee of Congress, in my judgment, has ever had to deal with. I was on the Ways and Means Committee during the war, when $7,000,000,000 in revenue was raised, but that was easy compared with the picture that confronts us to-day. At that time war was on; no one complained of taxes; business was prosperous, and the income tax, individual and corporate, as well as the excess-profits tax, yielded tremendous amounts of revenue. However, that is not the picture to-day.

It is very easy to say, if I may use this expression, "Soak the rich," but you can not put a tax on incomes, individual and corporate, which will produce anything comparable to the amount of money that is necessary to balance the Budget. Business is depressed, deductions for losses are enormous, and the yield in taxes from these sources will be greatly reduced.

The Treasury Department has given us a picture of the situation which I felt constrained, as acting chairman of the Ways and Means Committee, to present to you and to the country.

At the end of the fiscal year 1931 there was a deficit of $903,000,000. That has now been wiped out as a deficit but has been added to the bonded indebtedness of the United States and the national indebtedness has increased by that amount. At the end of this fiscal year, July 1, 1932, there will be another deficit of $2,100,000,000, which means the Government has spent $2,100,000,000 more than it has received. Again, under the Treasury bookkeeping, these deficits are not carried forward, but at the end of the fiscal year they are incorporated in the funded or bonded national debt. So at the end of the current fiscal year, July 1, 1932, again $2,100,000,000 will be added to your national debt, and that is even if you do not increase expenditures and appropriations; and if you pass additional appropriations, you will add that much more to the picture. It is estimated that at the end of the fiscal year 1933, unless $1,240,000,000 additional is collected from taxes, your Budget will not be balanced, and it is estimated it will take $1,240,000,000 of new revenue to balance your Budget by 1933, and that is not counting the $497,000,000 required for public-debt retirement. If you put that in, it is $1,738,000,000 plus.

That is the picture, and I say this with the utmost kindness and with no partisanship, for there will be no partisanship in the preparation of this tax bill. [Applause.] It is to be a governmental bill. But these huge deficits occurred under Republican administration. For 12 years the Republicans have been in charge of every branch of the Government—the executive and both branches of Congress. But to-day this it not a political question. It is not a theory. It is a condition, and I, for one, and my colleagues on that committee, place country above party, and we are here ready to work for the good of all in an attempt to balance the Budget. [Applause.]

I say to you, my friends, that unless that Budget is balanced all of your temporary relief measures, your Reconstruction Finance Corporation and everything else, will be futile, for the corner stone on which employment and economic recovery rest is a balanced Budget.

To-day some of your Government bonds are selling as low as 85 cents on the dollar. If you continue to issue bonds, there will be a further depreciation. The premier security of the world to-day is the United States bond, and if you do not stop issuing bonds it will show further depreciation, and all industrial and commercial bonds, stocks, lands, and everything else will depreciate.

Now, I, for one, have burned every bridge behind me. No matter what the personal political consequences may be to me, I am going to advocate the levying of sufficient taxes to balance the Budget. [Applause.] I know that in doing that I will be rendering my country a distinct public service. It means nothing to the United States whether I remain in Congress or not, but it means much to the United States Government that its honor, its credit, and its security be maintained at par. [Applause.]

Now, my friends, I want you and the country to gird yourselves with stamina, with backbone, and with courage to meet this emergency. All must make tremendous sacrifices. The Budget must be balanced. To do it additional taxes must be levied.

The Treasury Department in January submitted to us a statement that it would take $920,000,000 of additional taxes to balance the Budget by the end of the fiscal year 1933. That was in January, and they submitted a program of taxation which they thought would produce $920,000,000. In February, a few days ago, they revised those estimates and said that on account of business conditions, including $150,000,000 additional from post-office receipts, their program would only raise $786,000,000, and they said then and now that it will take $1,240,000,000 to balance the Budget. However, the program they recommend for raising revenue is over $600,000,000 shy. Yesterday, as acting chairman of the committee, I wrote the Treasury Department and asked them to make suggestions as to how we could raise this additional $600,000,000 plus in order to balance the Budget.

Gentlemen, I am receiving just as many telegrams and just as many letters protesting taxes as any one of you. I am writing my constituents that I regret the necessity of levying additional taxes, but that the need of all the people of the United States demands a balanced Budget and that I, myself, am going to vote for sufficient taxes to accomplish that purpose. [Applause.]

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may proceed for five additional minutes if he so desires. This is a most important subject.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Georgia may proceed for five additional minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Speaker, of necessity there must be either some form of general manufactures or sale tax or there must be an excise tax levied on sundry and divers commodities or industries. I say to you that the Ways and Means Committee is sitting around this table acting as patriots; no politics is in it. Everything is nebulous as to what items are involved to be subjected to excise taxes or how the money is to be raised, but I am happy to say I think the opinion of the committee is unanimous that we must face this unpleasant duty, put country above self, and come in with a bill that will balance the Budget.

I am now giving you this information. Each one of you is charged with the same responsibility to his country that I am. We were elected because our fellows had confidence in us and delegated us to represent them, and if we wear the crown, must we not also take the thorns? Will not our constituents have more respect for us if we acquit ourselves like men in this emergency than if we act otherwise?

I have concluded except to say that the Under Secretary of the Treasury before us the other day said he thought the Budget recommendation might be squeezed 2 per cent, and the estimate is $4,000,000,000. Two per cent would be $80,000,000 saved. I advised the Secretary that I would promptly acquaint my distinguished friend the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations [Mr. BYRNS] with this knowledge, and I did so.

Mr. BYRNS. May I interrupt the gentleman?

Mr. CRISP. Yes.

Mr. BYRNS. I will call the gentleman's attention to the fact that the deficiency bill which was passed in January by the Congress reduced the Budget estimate more than 10 per cent; that the Department of Agriculture bill, which has passed this House, reduces the Budget estimates between 6 and 7 per cent; that the Interior Department bill which is pending before the House has cut the estimates from $56,000,000 down to $50,000,000, which is over 10 per cent under the amount asked by the Budget. I think I can assure the gentleman and assure the Under Secretary of the Treasury that if this House will stand by the Committee on Appropriations, every one of these bills will be reduced—not 2 per cent but at least 5 per cent, and, in some instances, I hope, 12 or 15 per cent. [Applause.]

Mr. CRISP. I may say to my friend that I advised the Under Secretary of the gentleman's statement, because I knew that all these bills were coming in under what the Budget had recommended, and I hope we will be able to make tremendous savings, for the expenses of government must be reduced.

I appeal to you, my colleagues, when you are considering matters involving new appropriations, rest assured that taxes will have to be levied to pay for them, because the Government can not run a printing press and print money and make it good. [Applause.] Let me say that Germany printed money and 25 cents in our money would buy about a million dollars worth of their marks. The Government of the United States can only maintain its currency and its bonds at par by levying taxes to meet the expenses of the Government, and it is our duty to reduce the expenses of the Government as far as they can possibly be reduced, and I think you can cut off many surplus bureaus. [Applause.]

I attach herewith a summary of the fiscal situation of the Government pertinent to these remarks.

Treasury statement, January 13

Deficit for fiscal year 1931	$903,000,000
Deficit for fiscal year 1932	2,123,000,000
Deficit for fiscal year 1933	1,417,000,000

Treasury statement, February 9

Deficit for fiscal year 1931 is	$903,000,000
Deficit for fiscal year 1932 is	2,123,000,000
Plus as many hundred millions as are added for emergency expenditures before July 1, 1932.
Estimated deficit for 1933 (fiscal year)	1,738,000,000

A difference of $321,000,000 above the estimate of Jan. 13. To this deficit will be added all extra expenditures in fiscal year 1933.

Additional revenues to balance Budget, 1933

Jan. 13	$920,000,000
Feb. 9	1,241,000,000
Increase	321,000,000

Treasury recommendations to balance 1933 Budget

Jan. 13	$920,000,000
Feb. 9. Excluding increased postal revenues	636,000,000
Difference	284,000,000
The present statement of the 1933 deficit is	1,738,000,000
It is not expected to pay the statutory debt retirement which for 1933 is in the sum of	497,000,000
Additional revenue requirements	1,241,000,000
Treasury recommendations (excluding postal revenue)	636,000,000

Still shy	268,000,000
	1,241,000,000

In addition to this amount of $268,000,000 needed, if every Treasury proposal is enacted into law, there must still be raised to balance the Budget whatever amount, if any, the increased expenditures in 1933 exceed the increased revenue, if any.

MALVEN A. WILLIAMS

The SPEAKER. By order of the House, bills on the Private Calendar unobjected to are in order to-day. The Clerk will call the calendar, beginning at the star.

The Clerk called the first bill on the Private Calendar, H. R. 3610, for the relief of Malven A. Williams.

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That in the administration of any laws conferring rights, privileges, and benefits upon honorably discharged soldiers Malven A. Williams, who was a member of Troop E, Second Regiment United States Cavalry, and later of the band of said Second Regiment United States Cavalry, shall hereafter be held and considered to have been honorably discharged from the military service of the United States as a private of the latter organization on the 16th day of May, 1900: Provided, That no bounty, back pay, pension, or allowance shall be held to have accrued prior to the passage of this act.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

GEORGE WALTERS

The Clerk called the next bill on the Private Calendar, H. R. 3612, for the relief of George Walters.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I want to ask the gentleman from California [Mr. SWING] a question. The bill which we just allowed to pass was where one of his constituents was on leave, got drunk in Habana, and waked up on a schooner somewhere. We granted that bill for him and let it pass because the gentleman said he had been shanghaied, but as to this second bill of the gentleman from California The Adjutant General says:

Nothing has been found of record in my office to show specifically that George Walters participated in any battle, engagement, or skirmishes.

When the War Department says he was in no battle or engagement——

Mr. SWING. No; I beg the gentleman's pardon as to what the War Department said. The War Department before that statement said that the company to which he belonged and of which he was an active member was in this engagement. They did not have his name separate and distinct, but his company was so engaged.

Mr. BLANTON. Has the gentleman assured himself that he was in these engagements?

Mr. SWING. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. Is he battle scarred?

Mr. SWING. I can not say about that.

Mr. BLANTON. Well, I shall not object.

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That in the administration of any laws conferring rights, privileges, and benefits upon honorably discharged soldiers George Walters, who was a member of Company C, First Regiment United States Infantry, shall hereafter be held and considered to have been honorably discharged from the military service of the United States as a private of that organization on the 17th day of March, 1904: Provided, That no bounty, back pay, pension, or allowance shall be held to have accrued prior to the passage of this act.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

GARRETT M. MARTIN

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 3996) for the relief of Garrett M. Martin.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. BANKHEAD). Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That in the administration of any laws conferring rights, privileges, and benefits upon honorably discharged soldiers Garrett M. Martin, who was a member of Company I, Eighty-third Regiment Ohio Volunteer Infantry, shall hereafter be held and considered to have been honorably discharged from the military service of the United States as a member of that organization on the 10th day of October, 1864: Provided, That no bounty, back pay, pension, or allowance shall be held to have accrued prior to the passage of this act.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

JOHN RALSTON

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 4286) for the relief of John Ralston.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. BLANTON. Reserving the right to object, the bill states that this man was discharged, his discharge dating from December 23, 1865. The report states that his company was mustered out of service on June 1, 1865. Why this discrepancy? Which is the correct date?

Mr. MURPHY. It has been some time since I looked the matter up.

Mr. BLANTON. Very well. Since no benefit accrues prior to the date of the passage of this bill, I presume the discrepancy is unimportant, and I will not object.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That in the administration of any laws conferring rights, privileges, and benefits upon honorably discharged soldiers John Ralston, late of Company B, Ninety-eighth Regiment Ohio Volunteer Infantry, shall hereafter be held and considered to have been honorably discharged from the military service of the United States as a private of that organization on the 23d day of December, 1865: Provided, That no bounty, back pay, pension, or allowance shall be held to have accrued prior to the passage of this act.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

LEMUEL SIMPSON

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 4360) for the relief of Lemuel Simpson.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. ROMJUE. Mr. Speaker, a similar bill has been passed by the Senate, and I ask unanimous consent that Senate 315 be substituted for the House bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the Senate bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the administration of the pension laws and laws conferring rights and privileges upon honorably discharged soldiers, their widows, and dependent relatives, Lemuel Simpson, late of Company B, Seventh Regiment Missouri Volunteer Cavalry, and Company K, Fifty-first Regiment Indiana Volunteer Infantry, shall be held and considered to have been honorably discharged from the military service of the United States as a member of said Company B, Seventh Regiment Missouri Volunteer Cavalry: Provided, That no back pay, pension, bounty, or other emoluments shall be held to have accrued prior to the passage of this act.

Mr. ROMJUE. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following amendment:

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 1, line 11, after the word "cavalry," insert the words "on the 20th day of February, 1862."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BLANTON. I have not a copy of the Senate bill. I would like to ask the gentleman if it carries the same proviso as the House bill, that no back pay, pension, bounty, or other emoluments shall accrue prior to the passage of this act?

Mr. ROMJUE. That is in the Senate bill.

The Senate bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

The House bill was laid on the table.

BELLE ACKERMAN

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 4363) for the relief of Belle Ackerman, widow of Adam B. Ackerman, alias Adam B. Aunkerman, deceased.

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That in the administration of any laws conferring rights, privileges, and benefits upon honorably discharged soldiers, Adam B. Ackerman, alias Aunkerman, who was a member of Company B, Seventeenth Regiment Indiana Volunteer Infantry, shall hereafter be held and considered to have been discharged honorably from the military service of the United States as a private of that organization on the 5th day of July, 1862: Provided, That no bounty, back pay, pension, or allowance shall be held to have accrued prior to the passage of this act.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

THOMAS CONLON

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 4457) for the relief of Thomas Conlon.

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That in the administration of any laws conferring rights, privileges, and benefits upon honorably discharged soldiers, Thomas Conlon, who was a member of Company L, First Regiment New York Volunteer Light Artillery, shall hereafter be held and considered to have been honorably discharged from the military service of the United States as a private of that organization on the 6th day of January, 1863: Provided, That no bounty, back pay, pension, or allowance shall be held to have accrued prior to the passage of this act.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

WILLIAM J. M'KENNA

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 4810) for the relief of William J. McKenna.

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That in the administration of any law conferring rights, privileges, or benefits upon honorably discharged soldiers William J. McKenna, who served as a captain in the Chemical Warfare Service, shall be held to have been honorably discharged on November 8, 1918: Provided, That no back pay, pension, or allowance shall be held to have accrued prior to the passage of this act.

With the following committee amendment:

Page 1, line 8, after the word "pay," insert the word "bounty."

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

WILLIAM H. STROUD

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 4990) for the relief of William H. Stroud.

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That in the administration of any law conferring rights, privileges, and benefits upon honorably discharged soldiers William H. Stroud, who was a member of Troop G, Sixth Regiment United States Cavalry, shall hereafter be held and considered to have been honorably discharged from the military service of the United States as a member of that organization on the 30th day of January, 1875: Provided, That no bounty, back pay, pension, or allowance shall be held to have accrued prior to the passage of this act.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

CHRISTOPHER COTT

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 4992) for the relief of Christopher Cott.

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That in the administration of any laws conferring rights, privileges, and benefits upon honorably discharged soldiers Christopher Cott, who was a member of Company M, Ninth Regiment United States Infantry, shall hereafter be held and considered to have been honorably discharged from the military service of the United States as a member of that organization on the 5th day of August, 1901: Provided, That no bounty, back pay, pension, or allowance shall be held to have accrued prior to the passage of this act.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

ALEXANDER M. PROCTOR

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 5564) for the relief of Alexander M. Proctor.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

Mr. SPARKS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to substitute an identical Senate bill, S. 2179.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Kansas?

Mr. STAFFORD. Reserving the right to object, I have not made any detailed examination of this bill. There is a notation on the report that this bill at some time or other received a pocket veto by the President.

Mr. SPARKS. That is true.

Mr. STAFFORD. Has the gentleman from Kansas any information as to whether that is true?

Mr. SPARKS. Yes, sir. In that bill the provision was, in substance, to the effect that the beneficiary of the bill should have the privileges of an honorable discharge from the time of the enactment of the bill, and the President said in substance that that was not generous enough to the beneficiary of the bill.

Mr. STAFFORD. Then the President did not express any objection to the bill in its present form?

Mr. SPARKS. No. In fact, it is in conformity with the desire of the President, as I understand it.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw the reservation of objection with that explanation.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the Senate bill, as follows:

S. 2179

Be it enacted, etc., That in the administration of any laws conferring rights, privileges, and benefits upon honorably discharged soldiers Alexander M. Proctor, late of Company B, Twenty-third Regiment United States Infantry, shall hereafter be held and considered to have been honorably discharged from the military service of the United States as a member of said company and regiment on the 1st day of May, 1878: Provided, That no bounty, back pay, pension, or allowance shall be held to have accrued prior to the passage of this act.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

A similar House bill was laid on the table.

STUART L. RITZ

The Clerk called the next bill, H. R. 7167, for the relief of Stuart L. Ritz.

There being no objection, the bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That in the administration of any laws conferring rights, privileges, and benefits upon honorably discharged soldiers Stuart L. Ritz, late of Company L, Second Regiment United States Infantry, shall hereafter be held and considered to have been honorably discharged from the military service of the United States on the — day of ———, 1899: Provided, That no bounty, back pay, pension, or allowance shall be held to have accrued prior to the passage of this act.

With the following committee amendment:

Page 1, line 8, after the word "the," insert before the word "day" the figures "22d," and after the word "of" insert the word "April."

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider laid on the table.

JAMES MOFFITT

The Clerk called the next bill, H. R. 1039, for the relief of James Moffitt.

There being no objection, the bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That in the administration of any laws conferring rights, privileges, and benefits upon honorably discharged soldiers James Moffitt, who served in Company F, First Regiment United States Infantry, war with Spain, shall hereafter be held and considered to have been honorably discharged from the military service of the United States as a member of said company August 25, 1900: Provided, That no back pay, bounty, pension, or allowance shall be held to have accrued prior to the passage of this act.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider laid on the table.

RUSSELL & TUCKER

The Clerk called the next bill, H. R. 4938, for the relief of Russell & Tucker and certain other citizens of the States of Texas, Oklahoma, and Kansas.

Mr. UNDERHILL. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, this bill and the one following are two of the most dangerous bills that this House possibly could enact into law and thereby establish the liability of the United States in practically all of its quarantine regulations. Although this bill gives a right to the petitioners to sue before a district court, in reality it guarantees that the United States, through the fault of its agent, through error, in an endeavor to protect the interests of the people of the United States, to save them money and to protect other sections from disease, is going to be held liable for every failure of the quarantine regulations. That does not apply alone to cattle, but it applies as well to animal life and to human life.

The State of New York at the present time has on file a bill of a similar character, which they propose to introduce into Congress immediately upon the passage of any legislation of this character. It calls for over $60,000,000 for the failure of the agents of the Government in properly quarantining immigrants who have become a charge and have been a charge on the State of New York. My own State of Massachusetts can offer a similar bill, which will amount in the end to about $30,000,000.

I suppose that objection to this bill will be considered as a reflection upon the courts. Well, if it is a reflection on the courts, we will let it go at that, but I will say for the benefit of the House that I do not believe any such claim as this can be presented to a local court and be adjudicated to the benefit of the United States and to protect the Treasury of the United States.

We have just listened to a most eloquent and patriotic address by the gentleman from Georgia with reference to balancing the Budget, but if bills like these are allowed to pass Congress and get by the Executive, then the amount which will be saved by reducing the estimates of the Budget will be infinitesimal to the amount that all such bills as these will require. It touches the foot-and-mouth disease, hog cholera, even the pink boll worm and the boll weevil; in fact, everything that the United States quarantines for the benefit of the public must be absolutely guaranteed at 100 per cent, and any failure on the part of the agent or any neglect on the part of the agent can justly be attributed to the Government.

If a bill could be brought in covering such cases as might possibly occur, and have occurred, in connection with cattle that have been killed because of the improper solution in which they were dipped I would offer no objection, because that is an inexcusable fault on the part of the Government agents, but where they dip these cattle and through the fault of the agent—I will go as far as to admit it is the fault of the agent—they carry this tick into other sections, or clean sections, of the country, you should not reimburse those who have been injured thereby out of the Treasury of the United States.

The two conditions are not analogous. The solution must be correct in order to kill the tick; it can not be too strong or it kills the cattle.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. UNDERHILL. Mr. Speaker, may I have two minutes more?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

Mr. KLEBERG. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. UNDERHILL. Let me finish this statement, and then the gentleman can argue it out in his own time.

This matter has been before the Committee on Claims for several years. It was a matter of such serious consequences that the then chairman of the committee was willing to take upon his shoulders the criticism and the blame which attached to him or to the committee for the refusal to even hear the arguments with reference to it.

It has, unfortunately, a dangerous combination. Texas, Arkansas, Kansas, Oklahoma, and perhaps other States are interested because of the people who live there, and this kind of combination is pretty hard to beat on the floor of this House or before any committee; but I want to prophesy right now that if you adopt such measures as this the United States will have to abandon every quarantine regulation or efforts for the protection of its people. It will have to abandon the shipping of cattle, it will have to abandon its quarantine regulations at ports of entry, it will have to abandon its plant quarantine. It will have to do away with it all, or else you will bankrupt the Treasury of the United States.

I object, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. SWANK. Will the gentleman withhold his objection?

Mr. UNDERHILL. I withhold my objection, Mr. Speaker, in order that the gentlemen on the other side may be heard.

Mr. SWANK. Mr. Speaker, we all agree it is our duty to protect the Treasury of the United States, and it is just as much our duty to protect the individual rights of the citizens of the United States.

I do not find any fault with the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. UNDERHILL] because he is doing what he has the right to do under the law and under the rules of the House in making this objection. I do not think the gentleman should make the objection, because all this bill does is to give certain citizens of the United States the right to go into a Federal court and try their claims where they allege that their cattle have been damaged by reason of erroneously dipping them and certifying them as clean by agents of the Bureau of Animal Industry of the Department of Agriculture; and there is seldom a session of the Congress that does not pass a bill like this in some other similar case. They can not try out their rights at all unless a bill like this is passed permitting them to go into court.

Most of these bills provide for a certain appropriation and state, for instance, a certain amount shall be allowed a certain person. This bill provides no appropriation at all, and if these men should go into court they do not have any cinch on winning their case. They have to prove that the agents of the Government were negligent in dipping the cattle that were bought down in Texas in 1918, 1919, 1922, and 1926.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Texas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SWANK. Yes.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Texas. They do not even have a jury if these claims are tried in the Federal court under this bill.

Mr. SWANK. Senate bill No. 620 was reported favorably by the committee in the Seventieth Congress and these two bills—H. R. 6154 and H. R. 4938—are identical bills. They have been amended to read just like the Senate bill reported before, and these bills come before you with a unanimous report from the committee this time, and for the first time, I believe. I can not for the life of me see how any person can deny a citizen the right of going into court and having his case tried. Certainly every citizen should have the right to do this.

Mr. KLEBERG. Mr. Speaker, I feel a little hesitant, being the author of this bill, in discussing the many dangers to which this bill subjects the Treasury of the United States. I really feel almost convicted in and out of court.

I appreciate the distinction made by my colleague, the distinguished gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. UNDERHILL], between these particular cases wherein the citizens, livestock men of my State, are to be denied the right to appear in a court representing the Federal Government, and the cases where a direct appropriation is made. My distinguished colleague suggests he would be in favor of these measures, or at least would not object, if the cases were brought up asking for a direct appropriation.

Mr. UNDERHILL. The gentleman is in error.

Mr. KLEBERG. One moment. Let me use my own time.

Mr. UNDERHILL. But the gentleman is in error. I said if they were brought up asking for a distinct appropriation for the death of cattle caused by dipping.

Mr. KLEBERG. I see. The gentleman goes on and says that he would not consent to allowing a citizen of the United States to go into court asking for relief from a Government agency which, through negligence, had deprived the man of his property, thereby being a deprivation of property without due process of law.

The gentleman favors that. I understand the gentleman is in favor of economy. I, too, am in favor of economy. I have had many years' experience in dipping cattle. It has been my personal business to rid a range of half a million acres of the cattle tick. I happened to be qualified as an inspector. I know how easy it is for an inspector to be negligent. I know how dangerous it is to a range, where the Government has spent thousands of dollars to rid them of the ticks, to have them reinfected. It happened to be my duty to see to it that the reinfections did not occur in the area under my personal supervision.

This bill is a measure of economy in every detail. In the first place, the people of this country have a right to expect as nearly perfect protection by representatives of the Government as in any other branch of the Government, while a representative of the Government operates on behalf of the people. In the second place, if the bill passes it will restore confidence of the people whose cattle are subjected to the dipping process, and this is elemental and vital to the success of the dipping process.

In sections of Texas, where the dipping of cattle has not been successful, it has been a failure because the owner of the cattle has no confidence in the procedure, and, in addition, because he felt that the inspectors are not called upon to do their level best. And, if possible, he gets over the argument that he is afraid that because his neighbor has not dipped his cattle properly that they will reinfect his and his money and time will be spent for nothing. He is afraid that his cattle will be reinfected, when he desires to improve his herd by the importation of blooded livestock from tick-free areas.

Mr. SCHAFER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KLEBERG. I yield.

Mr. SCHAFER. Has not this bill the same fundamental principle as the bills which we continually pass on the Private Calendar providing $5,000 for the widow or orphan children of some person killed by an automobile by reason of the negligence of a Government employee? This bill does not even go that far, as Congress does not determine the question of negligence or the amount to be paid, but refers the question to the Court of Claims, a body created to determine the merits of the claims against the Government.

Mr. KLEBERG. In so far as the gentleman's suggestion goes, yes; but it has an additional quality. In this particular measure the question of negligence is not presumed. In the Court of Claims they have so arranged that the question of negligence must be proven.

Now, am I to suppose that the livestock men in the range country so affected are not in the future to have an opportunity for redress in case of the negligence of the representatives of the Government?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. UNDERHILL. I object.

PORTER BROS. & BIFFLE

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 6154) for the relief of Porter Bros. & Biffle, and certain other citizens.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

Mr. UNDERHILL. I object.

WILLIAM T. ROCHE

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 571) for the relief of William T. Roche.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. EATON of Colorado. Reserving the right to object, I would like to ask the author of the bill to make a statement.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Iowa. The report filed on this bill states that in December, 1914, the claimant's hands were very badly frozen while making one of his regular trips on the road as a mail carrier, and his hands had to be amputated. He received the maximum compensation allowed under the act of 1908, but now he is totally incapacitated. Your committee feels that this is a case of exceptional merit and therefore recommends the passage of this bill as amended.

The facts are these: This is to extend relief, as provided under the act of 1916, and this happened in 1914. To be sure of my ground with reference to this bill I called up the department to find if other bills of exactly the same character had been allowed, and I found that many bills of exactly the same character as this have been allowed. As the committee reports, this bill is of exceptional merit. The facts are that the mercury was some 24° below zero in a small town that adjoins the town where I live. It was impossible to go in a closed car, so he went in an open sleigh. This man was compelled to reach in the boxes to get frozen pennies. His hands became chilled. He finished his trip, and when he got back he was compelled to go to the hospital, and both hands were amputated, taking the thumbs and all the fingers and half of both hands.

Now, if bills of this character and bills that do not have even the merits that this bill has have been allowed in the past, I certainly think this bill should be allowed.

I want to say further than a year ago this matter was taken up, and this bill passed the House at that time with no objection.

Mr. EATON of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, in answer to the gentleman, upon his statement I am rather loath to object to this bill, but upon the principles involved I can do nothing but object. I think possibly the principle that is applied to these bills is wrong, but other bills have been presented at this session and have been objected to on grounds that are in violation of the very principle of the compensation law. This case and others occurred long before the compensation law went into effect. I must object, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Iowa. In answer to that objection, the objection I have is that Members can get up on this floor who, within the past two years, have been able to put over in this House claims that did not have the merit which this claim has. There are claims that go back two years further than this claim goes, and yet these objectors object to my claim when it is presented here and they let other claims of the same character go. That is the thing that I object to in this House.

Mr. EATON of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, I have the greatest sympathy with this claim and with other claims of like nature, four or five of which are on the calendar to-day, but it appears that the committee has entirely overlooked the Compensation Commission and its duty and its function. Nothing in regard to their work is considered by the presentation of these bills. There is no doubt that there are a few claimants, of whom this appears to be one, where the Compensation Commission rules might be applied even at this late date. But other claims presented last week have been denied, and I must object.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. EATON of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, I object.

R. L. WILSON

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 756) for the relief of R. L. Wilson.

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to R. L. Wilson, of Anthony, Kans., the sum of $500. Such sum represents the amount paid into the Treasury of the United States pursuant to a plea of guilty for violation of certain provisions of sections 32 and 37 of the Criminal Code; whereas other individuals indicted with R. L. Wilson, and who performed the same acts and who pleaded not guilty, were acquitted under an instructed verdict, for the reason the court held that the evidence did not disclose any violation of the law.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

MOREAU M. CASLER

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 1172) for the relief of Moreau M. Casler.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. EATON of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, for the same reason which objection was made to H. R. 6154, and for the further reason that the form of this bill is made for the Compensation Commission to pay a definite sum per month for life, I object to the bill.

JOHN J. CORCORAN

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 1846) for the relief of John J. Corcoran.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. BACHMANN. Mr. Speaker, I object.

MARY COOPER

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 2153) for the relief of Mary Cooper.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. BACHMANN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, this is a bill where the claimant is seeking to have the Government pay $5,000 for an injury to a woman by the name of Mary Cooper because she was injured by a truck driven by an employee of the Post Office Department, but according to the report the driver of the truck was in no way negligent, but the Police Department of the City of New York was negligent. In other words, a policeman driving a police car of the city of New York ran into the post-office truck and forced the post-office truck over on the sidewalk and into woman.

In the absence of further explanation, I object to the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. BACHMANN. I object.

JOHN W. BARNUM

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 2304) for the relief of John W. Barnum.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. EATON of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, I object to that bill for the reasons assigned to the two previous bills.

CHARLES A. HOLDER

The Clerk called the next bill, H. R. 2417, for the relief of Charles A. Holder.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. BACHMANN. Mr. Speaker, I object.

The Clerk called the next bill, H. R. 2633, for the relief of William R. Cox.

There being no objection, the bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Postmaster General be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to credit the account of William R. Cox, postmaster at Pasco, Wash., in the sum of $103.81, due the United States on account of the loss resulting from the closing of the First National Bank of Pasco, Wash.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider laid on the table.

LUIS H. D'BAYLE

The Clerk called the next bill, H. R. 2775, for the relief of Dr. Luis H. DeBayle.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair has had his attention called to the fact that there is a similar Senate bill.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Senate bill be substituted in lieu of the House bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. SCHAFER. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, is the Senate bill in the exact form of the House bill?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. There is this difference: The House bill provides for the reimbursement of the claimant, while the Senate bill provides for the full settlement of all claims against the Government. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Wisconsin?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the Senate bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $1,937.83 to Luis H. DeBayle, of Leon, Nicaragua, in full settlement of all claims against the Government for loss of drugs and other medical supplies taken from his pharmacy by personnel of the United States Marine Corps in January and February, 1928.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

A similar House bill (H. R. 2775) was laid on the table.

PHILIP F. HAMBSCH

The Clerk called the next bill, H. R. 2804, for the relief of Philip F. Hambsch.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. EATON of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to ask the author of the bill whether there is any evidence to show that the amounts involved have ever been paid.

Mr. COLE of Maryland. They have not been paid; at least, that is the assurance I have. A similar bill passed the House last session.

Mr. EATON of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, as this is a bill providing for the payment of the debt of a surety, I object.

FIREMAN'S FUND INSURANCE CO.

The Clerk called the next bill, H. R. 3373, for the relief of Fireman's Fund Insurance Co.

There being no objection, the bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum $121.44 to Fireman's Fund Insurance Co., of San Francisco, Calif., which sum is for the payment of judgment in connection with libel filed against one Dodge coupé automobile, engine No. A-917-814.

With the following committee amendments:

Line 4, strike out the words "any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated" and insert the words "the indefinite appropriation 'refunding moneys erroneously received and covered.'"

In line 11, strike out "A-917-814" and insert "A-917-841."

The committee amendments were agreed to.

Mr. BACHMANN. Mr. Speaker, I offer an amendment.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from West Virginia offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. BACHMANN: In line 8, strike out the words "for the payment of judgment" and insert "the balance left after all costs have been deducted from the price obtained at auction."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time and passed, and a motion to reconsider laid on the table.

W. F. NASH

The Clerk called the next bill, H. R. 3379, for the relief of W. F. Nash.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. BACHMANN. Mr. Speaker, I want to call the attention of the Members of the House to the fact that during the last session of Congress we passed this identical bill; it was passed by the Senate, it was signed by the President, and it is now Private Law No. 288, Seventy-first Congress. A bill is introduced in this Congress asking for this payment after the payment has already been made under the provisions of a law passed in the last Congress. Therefore I object.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Speaker, I intended to ask that this bill be stricken from the calendar, but the gentleman from West Virginia always anticipates me.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair would suggest to the gentleman from New York, in order to definitely dispose of the matter, he should request that the bill be rereferred to his committee, or that it be laid on the table.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the bill be rereferred to the Committee on Claims.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

H. H. LEE

The Clerk called the next bill, H. R. 4144, for the relief of H. H. Lee.

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $233.75 to H. H. Lee as final settlement of his claim for loss by fire to his own property while assigned to protection of Government holdings during the Half Moon forest fire in Glacier National Park.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

HALVOR H. GROVEN

The Clerk called the next bill, H. R. 4147, for the relief of Halvor H. Groven.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I want to call the attention of our friend from Montana [Mr. LEAVITT], who in the last Congress had the record of passing more bills than any other man in Congress, and whose present record is the same in this Congress, to the report that his Post Office Department makes on this bill. The Post Office Department says that—

Inasmuch as the postmaster had deposited $875 during the month of November and $864.98 during the month of December, and the business at the office barely averaged $1,000 per month, it is highly improbable that $829 was on hand at the time of the fire, in addition to the $187.51 for which credit has been allowed, in addition to $158.57 on deposit in the bank, and in addition to the $85 for which the postmaster admits responsibility. In view of the premises, I can not consistently recommend favorable action on the proposed legislation.

Mr. LEAVITT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. After this comment I shall yield. Our experience concerning postmasters has been, as is true in all classes, there are postmasters who make demands that are unjust and some that are not honest. There have been lots of them here. They have been called to the attention of this House by such distinguished gentlemen as Jim Mann, of Illinois, even by Uncle Joe Cannon, and by Martin B. Madden, three great former Representatives of one State. The reason we are now facing a deficit of over $1,000,000,000 is partly because of the fact that we are continually passing bills that take large sums of money out of the Treasury. We pass them so fast that even the Claims Committee can not keep up with them, and after it gets its bill passed and it becomes law and the money is paid in a prior Congress, the Claims Committee comes along and again reports and puts on the calendar the same bill. This shows there is reason for consideration by Members of the Congress of such bills, outside of the consideration given by the committee reporting the bill.

I will now yield. If the gentleman can show why this bill should be passed in the face of such an adverse report, he has ability greater than the ordinary Congressman possesses.

Mr. LEAVITT. I thank the gentleman. The situation is this: This bill was brought before the last Congress and it was quite extensively debated on the floor and passed by the House. It was pending in the Senate at the adjournment of the last Congress. I have talked since that time not only with Mr. Groven, the man who is involved, but also with the inspector who considered the matter on the ground. I have no doubt whatever that Mr. Groven lost this money. He also lost a very considerable amount of his own money.

Mr. BLANTON. I will say to my friend from Montana that with such conscientious objectors here present from his own party, representing his own administration, which after all is responsible to the people for the present deficit, as our friend from West Virginia [Mr. BACHMANN], our distinguished friend from Colorado [Mr. EATON], who sits here and watches the bills so often, and our other good friend from Wisconsin [Mr. SCHAFER], who watches some of them carefully and some not so carefully, and our other valuable friend from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD], if they can not stop such bills, I am not going to interefere with the present record of my friend from Montana as being one who passes more bills than anybody else in Congress.

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Postmaster General is authorized and directed to credit the account of Halvor H. Groven, late postmaster at Norheim, Mont., in the sum of $829, such sum representing the deficit in the account of the said Halvor H. Groven, caused by fire to the post office on January 2, 1928, and for which casualty the said Halvor H. Groven was in no way responsible.

Mr. SCHAFER. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike out the last word.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Was the gentleman on his feet asking for recognition?

Mr. SCHAFER. I was.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will recognize the gentleman.

Mr. SCHAFER. I merely want to keep the record straight, after the burst of eloquence of our distinguished objecting friend from Texas [Mr. BLANTON], wherein he tried to lay the blame for passing private claim bills on the Republican Party, and particularly upon individual members of that party who happen to be on the floor of the House. I wish to inform the gentleman from Texas that when I consider bills as a member of the Claims Committee, I reach a decision in committee as to whether they are good or bad. If the gentleman will carefully study the records of the Claims Committee he will see that the committee reports on most of that committee's bills on the Private Calendar were unanimous reports, approved of by both Democrat as well as Republican members. What a ridiculous position the gentleman from Texas puts himself in before the country. He stood up here and consumed five minutes' time depicting what an awful monstrosity several bills were, and that they ought not to be passed, and indicating what a wonderful watchdog of the Treasury he is, and then he crawls out from under, does not object to their consideration, and tries to pass the blame upon the Republican Members of the House. If the bill was such a monstrosity, why did not he object to it, as it was his privilege to do? No; he did not. He was merely trying to get more publicity for being the watchdog of the Treasury.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SCHAFER. I will yield to the distinguished gentleman from Texas, who placed in nomination the other day a Democratic candidate for President who is so wet that he voted against submitting the eighteenth amendment to the various States at the time that the House originally voted for such submission.

Mr. BLANTON. That shows that the nominee is of such outstanding ability that the gentleman from Texas supports him.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will suggest to gentlemen that the gentleman from Wisconsin moved to strike out the last word, and the last word is "responsible."

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I rise in opposition to the pro forma amendment.

Mr. BLACK. I demand the regular order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The regular order is the gentleman from Texas rises to oppose the amendment.

Mr. BLACK. A parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman from Texas yield to the gentleman from New York to make a parliamentary inquiry?

Mr. BLANTON. If the gentleman from New York has any question that pertains to the subject under discussion, which is "responsibility," I will yield.

Mr. BLACK. I desire to ask if the Speaker had not announced that the bill had passed?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Speaker did so announce, but subsequently thought it was improperly made, because the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. SCHAFER] was on his feet asking for recognition. So the regular order is that the gentleman from Texas may proceed.

Mr. BLACK. May I propound a further parliamentary inquiry?

Mr. BLANTON. No; I do not yield further. Now, Mr. Speaker, the word "responsible" relates to the subject of responsibility. There is a responsibility that rests on the shoulders of every individual Member of the House, as well as upon the shoulders collectively of the members of a committee. There was a time in the history of this Congress when the District Committee, for instance, brought into the House so many bad bills that the House lost confidence in that committee, and it was hard to get a bill passed when brought up by the District Committee.

I do not want the great Claims Committee, headed by the distinguished "chief justice of New York" [Mr. BLACK], to lose its reputation for responsibility on the floor by bringing in bills that were passed in the last Congress and the money already paid.

That was the reason I referred to the gentleman from Wisconsin. The gentleman objects to some bills, but when the bill of my good friend the gentleman from California [Mr. SWING] was being considered, which showed that a man got drunk over on the west coast and the next time he came to consciousness and reached responsibility he found that he was out on a schooner on the bosom of the ocean and he said he had been shanghaied, the gentleman made no objection to that bill and let it pass. Another bill came up where the War Department said that an officer had become drunk and had deserted his company and was not found for many years and that he had been discharged from service by order of the President of the United States, and I did not object because I felt that surely my distinguished friend the gentleman from Wisconsin would not uphold a man getting drunk and abusing his privileges as an officer of the United States Army.

Mr. SCHAFER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. I yield.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that the gentleman from Texas is not discussing the pending bill.

Mr. BLANTON. I am discussing the subject of responsibility.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Texas will proceed in order.

Mr. SCHAFER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. On a "responsible" question I yield.

Mr. SCHAFER. Perhaps the gentleman from Texas evaded his responsibility in failing to object to these alleged drunk bills because the gentleman has recently become a wet convert, since a few days ago he placed in nomination as the Democratic candidate for the Presidency of the United States one who was even so wet that he voted against submitting the eighteenth amendment to the several States for ratification.

Mr. BLANTON. Oh, the gentleman from Wisconsin can not place my nominee in either the wet or dry column. The people of the United States know our distinguished Speaker so well, and have such an abiding confidence in him, that they will take him wet or dry. They know that he is so valuable to the country, he is so needed in this great crisis, and need him so much to bring back normal conditions that they will take him wet or dry. [Laughter and applause.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the passage of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

JENS H. LARSEN

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 4232) for the relief of Jens H. Larsen.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. BACHMANN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, is there any Member present who can show where there is any responsibility of the Government, either moral or legal, which would warrant the passage of this bill?

Mr. BLACK. This is a case where a man's automobile was parked beside the post-office building and he was a post-office worker. The ice fell through the roof of his car. The ice fell from the post-office building. Either God Almighty or the Post Office Department is responsible for this. And we do not allow claims to run against God Almighty in this committee, so that there is nobody else but the United States Government to pay for it.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. BACHMANN. Mr. Speaker, I object.

GEORGE E. CASEY

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 4868) for the relief of George E. Casey.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. GRISWOLD. Reserving the right to object, I would like to inquire of the author of this bill whether the gentleman knows that the rules of the Post Office Department require this man to keep a safe?

Mr. HASTINGS. This was a postmaster in a small place where there was not any bank. There are only two stores, and this was a case where the post office was robbed. Two or three of the robbers were afterwards apprehended, and they were convicted in the Federal court and are serving a term in the Federal penitentiary. Forty dollars and some cents of this was money, and the balance was property, including money orders that were in the small post office at that place. There was not any bank there in which money or other property could be deposited. I will say to the gentleman that this is a bill that was considered at the last session and was favorably reported by the Committee on Claims. It passed the House, but because of congested conditions in the last days of the Senate, it was not reached, although it was favorably reported and on the calendar.

I invite the gentleman's attention to the last paragraph of the report from the Post Office Department, where they say—

> In view of the somewhat exceptional circumstances under which the loss occurred, the department will interpose no objection to favorable action on the pending bill, if Congress will consider the farmer postmaster entitled to relief.

Mr. GRISWOLD. But I would like to call the gentleman's attention to that same report, in which the postal inspectors were around prior to this robbery and admonished him that he was not keeping the money in a safe place.

Mr. HASTINGS. Now, the question as to whether it was safer to leave it in the post office or safer to carry it over to his residence and to carry it back and forth at night, is the question to be considered. It was certainly as safe there as it was any other place. There was no safer place for him to keep it, because as I have stated, this is a small town where there are only two stores, and there was no bank, and there was no safer place to deposit or keep it.

Mr. BLACK. Another thing, originally this postmaster had kept these certificates in his home, but the inspector insisted that he dismiss his daughter as assistant and put in another girl whose mother refused to allow her to have these United States certificates in her home.

Mr. GRISWOLD. There is a discrepancy between the bill and the report from the Postmaster General of about a year in the date of this burglary.

Mr. HASTINGS. There may be some discrepancy about the date, I have not examined that part of the report, but the fact was that there was a burglary there and the burglars apprehended and convicted.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

> Be it enacted, etc., That the Postmaster General is authorized and directed to credit the account of George E. Casey, former postmaster at Bunch, Okla., in the sum of $103.20. Such sum represents the amount of a deficit in the account of the said George E. Casey, caused by the burglarizing of the post office at Bunch, Okla., on the night of May 19, 1926, of $40.71 in cash, and blank money-order forms stolen and filled out, in the sum of $62.49, making a total of $103.20.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider laid on the table.

JAMES B. CONNER

The Clerk called the next bill, H. R. 4989, for the relief of James B. Conner.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. EATON of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, this is another bill that attempts to take money out of the Employees' Compensation Commission. The bill provides that $2,500 shall be paid for the loss of an eye, whereas the employee involved 20 years ago received all of the money that was due him for that injury. Therefore I object.

YOSEMITE LUMBER CO.

The Clerk called the next bill, H. R. 5047, for the relief of the Yosemite Lumber Co.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. ENGLEBRIGHT. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, the forest fire involved in this bill occurred in my congressional district. I have received no communication from the Park Service, and the report of the Superintendent of the Park Service is adverse to the claim. I ask the gentleman from California to let the matter go over until I can take it up with the Park Service.

Mr. WELCH of California. But the gentleman will notice that the department reports favorably upon the bill.

Mr. ENGLEBRIGHT. Upon that statement by the gentleman I withdraw my reservation of objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. PATTERSON. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to have the gentleman who is the author of the bill make some explanation of the bill.

Mr. WELCH of California. Mr. Speaker, an identical bill was passed at the last session of Congress, at which time no objection was made to the claim. It failed of consideration in the other branch of Congress by reason of the illness of the chairman of the subcommittee.

The bill has for its purpose the reimbursement of the Yosemite Lumber Co., a California corporation, for the actual expenses incurred in successfully fighting a fire within the Yosemite National Forest. My colleague [Mr. ENGLEBRIGHT] from California has made reference to an adverse report made by the Park Service. May I read from the report made by the Secretary of the Interior?—

This fire started immediately outside of the park but spread rapidly to park lands. It was first observed by representatives of the lumber company who were conducting logging operations in the near vicinity. Although their own lands were not immediately threatened, the company shut down their entire operation and put their entire crew of 242 men on the fire. It appears that without doubt the actual expenses of the company in connection with the fighting of this fire amounted to $6,222.75, the amount of their original claim, and that unless this supplemental claim of $2,114.74 is paid, the company will have actually sustained a direct loss of that amount. Inquiry at the Forest Service reveals that claims for the payment of expenses in excess of the standard fire-fighting rates when similarly incurred are customarily approved.

For the above reasons I am in favor of enactment of this proposed legislation.

I am advised by the Director of the Bureau of the Budget under date of February 16 that this report is not in conflict with the President's financial program.

It will be observed that the Yosemite Lumber Co. is not asking consideration for the time during which their plant was shut down. The season of operation, as my colleague from California will agree, is very limited. This company suffered a loss of four days of actual work during the brief period in which it is possible to operate in the State of California.

Mr. PATTERSON. It seems this company collected a portion of the claim, but there was a portion disallowed.

Mr. WELCH of California. Yes.

Mr. PATTERSON. If they had their case before the Park Commission or the comptroller, why should we now allow the claim? What is the authority for their volunteering and going within this forest to fight this fire? That is the point I would like to have the gentleman clear up for me.

Mr. WELCH of California. At the time they were allowed compensation paid to men who are drafted to fight forest fires.

Mr. PATTERSON. Is it a customary policy of the Park Service to use volunteers in that way and then compensate them?

Mr. WELCH of California. They were not volunteers. The practice of the department, when there is a large fire of this kind, is to go into the highways and into the centers of population and draft men into service whether they have had previous experience in fighting fires or not. They are forced, many against their will, and they simply go and fight the fire under the supervision of the Forest Service. In this instance the Yosemite Lumber Co. was the first to observe the fire, long before the Forest Service knew of its existence. The company saw the danger to this wonderful stand of timber within the national forest and it immediately closed down its own operations, put its stoves and cooking utensils on trucks, and took its entire force to the scene of the fire. This company stayed there four days with its own men, men trained in the service, lumberjacks, strong, healthy fellows who were equal to the occasion, and not the class of men usually picked up on the highways. By reason of that the company is asking the Government to allow them an amount equal to that which the men would have received had they remained in the employment of the company, instead of voluntarily going into the Government reservation and successfully putting out the fire.

Mr. PATTERSON. That is the explanation I wanted to get.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PATTERSON. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. There is no question whatsoever that these services were rendered by this company for the benefit of the Government in putting out this fire. There is no question but what this company paid them the wages they were receiving as their employees. The excess payment that is sought to be allowed here is merely the excess which is above that which is paid to volunteers.

Mr. PATTERSON. Yes; the gentleman from California [Mr. WELCH] brought that out.

Mr. STAFFORD. And I am impressed by the position of the Acting Secretary of the Department of the Interior with respect to the policy of the department in stating—

Inquiry at the Forest Service reveals that claims for the payment of expenses in excess of the standard fire-fighting rates when similarly incurred are customarily approved.

Although it is true this company derived benefit because they had adjoining property, yet they gave greater service to the Government and they are only asking reimbursement and not seeking to charge anything for loss of profits by reason of suspension of business.

Mr. PATTERSON. Under the explanation of the gentleman from California and my colleague from Wisconsin, I withdraw the reservation of objection, Mr. Speaker.

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to the Yosemite Lumber Co. the sum of $2,114.74. Such sum represents the difference between the actual cost of such company, for labor, supplies, and transportation of men, incurred in the fighting of forest fires in September, 1926, in the Yosemite National Park, and the amount paid such company by the National Park Service.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

JAMES E. DETHLEFSEN

The Clerk called the next bill on the Private Calendar, H. R. 5048, for the relief of James E. Dethlefsen.

Mr. EATON of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, in this bill is still another phase of employees' compensation perversion. In this one a man first tries to obtain compensation from the Government, and they find he was not employed by the Government. Then he deserts that and tries some other method, and now he comes back and wants to have a stated sum because he went out and rang the fire bell one night and called men to put out the fire and injured his hands.

I object, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. WELCH of California. Will the gentleman withhold his objection?

Mr. EATON of Colorado. I withhold it and reserve the right to object.

Mr. WELCH of California. If the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. EATON] could see the condition of the claimant, Mr. Dethlefsen—and I regret that I have not the photographs with me—they are in my office—he might not object to this meritorious claim. Dethlefsen was employed by the United States Government in Alaska. A fire broke out in a Government warehouse, and he, with others, volunteered in the absence of a fire department, not to ring the bell but to carry water and fight the fire. In an effort to save the building, Dethlefsen's hands were so badly frozen it was necessary to amputate all of his fingers and one thumb.

May I add that President Wilson, knowing the condition of this unfortunate man, recommended him for a position in the Government service regardless of civil service, a position which he is now holding and which pays him the nominal sum of $90 or $100 a month.

Mr. EATON of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, I simply wish to state that the bill under consideration is on all fours with the bill H. R. 571, to which objection was made, except in this case the amount of injury to the hands is different. I regret very much that a case of this sort is on the calendar for consideration. Sympathy is with the claimant, but I do, nevertheless, object.

EDWARD J. DEVINE

The Clerk called the next bill on the Private Calendar, H. R. 5146, for the relief of Edward J. Devine.

Mr. GRISWOLD. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, it seems from the statement of the Director of the United States Veterans' Bureau that there has already been paid on this account $107, which is the usual amount provided by statute to be paid in case of death, and I can not see any reason why a distinction should be made to raise the amount in the case of this veteran and discriminate in his favor and against all other veterans.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Speaker, the reason why a distinction should be made is because there was no distinction made originally. It happens there were two deceased veterans named Patrick J. Murtagh. The Veterans' Bureau paid for the expenses of the burial of one Patrick Murtagh to his wife, and the undertaker who buried the other Patrick Murtagh has never been compensated for his services. He was authorized to bury this man by the American Red Cross, who acted on the direction of the Veterans' Bureau, and the committee has found that, although the widow of a Patrick Murtagh was paid, the undertaker who buried this Patrick Murtagh was never paid.

Mr. GRISWOLD. I object, Mr. Speaker.

BERNIS BRIEN

The Clerk called the next bill on the Private Calendar, H. R. 5202, for the relief of Bernis Brien and John M. Springer.

Mr. PATTERSON. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, under the circumstances it seem to me this bill is not a very good one, to say the least. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. HARLAN] to make a statement in explanation of the bill.

Mr. HARLAN. In November, 1925, Mr. Bernis Brien was appointed treasurer of the Soldiers' Home at Dayton, Ohio. When he took office there was a man employed by the name of Spreng. I may say that the salary of Mr. Brien for this work was $2,500 a year. At the time he took office his books were audited by the War Department and the Bureau of National Homes. These audits showed that Spreng, the man who was in charge of the office, had his accounts all correct. Mr. Spreng kept charge of this office from 1925 to 1929. During these four years, twice a year the accounts of Spreng were audited by the War Department and by the Bureau of National Homes.

I may say that Spreng was not appointed by Brien. He was in there when Brien took charge.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HARLAN. I yield.

Mr. STAFFORD. I fail to find any statement in the report which supports the statement of the gentleman from Ohio, that when Major Brien took office the accounts were audited.

Mr. HARLAN. That is included, I believe, in a letter from Mr. Brien, or in the testimony.

Mr. STAFFORD. The letter of Mr. Wood, president of the Board of Managers, under date of March 6, 1930, stated that an audit of the accounts revealed that there was a deficit of $5,000 during the time Mr. Brien was treasurer.

The difficulty I have with the claim is that it seems that this political appointee—and they were all political appointees, for I have had some acquaintance with the character of the appointments in connection with the Northwestern Branch of the Soldiers' Home—did not exercise reasonable care in examining the books and accounts when he took office. He was negligent in the assumption of his duties at that time.

Mr. HARLAN. If the gentleman will look at page 5 of the report, I think in a letter from Mr. Brien he will find that the books were audited when he took charge.

Mr. STAFFORD. I have read the entire letter very carefully, and I did not get any such impression.

Mr. HARLAN. The books were audited twice a year, and during that time by the Bureau of National Homes and the War Department, and each one of them found that Spreng's account was O. K.

I will say that during the five years this man Spreng never took a vacation. He was on the job all the time. There was a system of loose-leaf bookkeeping involved in which, when the auditor came, he slipped some leaves out and inserted others, and when they were not there he returned them. Whenever Brien came around he did the same thing as when the auditors were there. He imposed on other governmental officials just as he did on Brien.

Mr. PATTERSON. Where is Spreng now?

Mr. HARLAN. Spreng is in the penitentiary, or I believe has just got out.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman point out in the affidavit or the letter where it states that the books were audited when Brien took charge?

Mr. HARLAN. I will look. In Mr. Brien's affidavit it says:

> The books were inspected once a year by the inspector general of the National Military Home and were also inspected once a year by the Inspector General of the United States Army.

Mr. SCHAFER. Mr. Speakèr, reserving the right to object, I see that this man was bonded for $5,000 by a bonding company. Why should Congress relieve the bonding company of all liability after it has received the premiums for underwriting the bond? If we are to pass bills because the Treasurer did not have an appointing power, if we are going to pay out of the Treasury in case of embezzlement and relieve all of the companies who have written bonds and accepted large premiums, we are setting a bad precedent.

Mr. HARLAN. If the gentleman will consider for a moment, the bonding company at the time the bond is written for a condition of this kind requires a reimbursing agreement with the bonding company, so that although the bonding company would be liable in this case, Mr. Brien will have to pay the bonding company.

Mr. SCHAFER. If we are going to follow that as a policy, then it is absolutely ridiculous to require any bond where the taxpayer's money is involved.

Mr. PATTERSON. I am in sympathy with the gentleman's statement along that line. If I read the report correctly, it seems the man has nothing and he could only be technically responsible to the bonding company, and they would not collect unless the Government pays it.

Mr. HARLAN. Well, that is not strictly true. He has a small income. He has enough money, but it will take every dime he has to make good to the bonding company. The thing that impresses me in this case is that we are holding this man to a liability for depending upon the duly appointed auditors and experts of the United States Government. We are holding him to a higher liability than we would hold them. Now, this does not mean the expenditure by the United States Government of anything. This money was taken from the post fund at the Dayton home. The post fund is made up of money that is left by veterans who die without wills and who leave no heirs. It was comparatively easy to steal from this fund unless the auditors caught them, because there was nobody to claim the money.

Mr. SCHAFER. In order to correct the record, the post fund also includes uncollected pensions that have been withheld in many cases arbitrarily by the Board of Managers of the National Home in the case of veterans who had left a will and last testament.

Mr. HARLAN. Well, it may include other funds than the funds I have mentioned.

Mr. SCHAFER. Well, does the gentleman seriously believe that in every case where we bond an official of the United States Government who has charge of the people's money that bond should not include the employees under him?

Mr. HARLAN. Well, that question is being raised in this case whether or not this bond was designed so to do. Prior to that time Mr. Springer, the predecessor of Mr. Brien, gave no such bond at all. The man who actually handled the money was not under bond in this case. The actual amount of money that will be required to be replaced in the post fund is a little less than one-third of the amount that Mr. Springer was charged with having taken.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. SCHAFER. Mr. Speaker, I object.

MARY S. NEEL

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 5221) for the relief of Mary S. Neel.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. ARENTZ. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the right to object until I can have a little explanation made regarding this by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLY].

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. While this measure deals with a small amount—$459—I believe it will correct an injustice against an efficient employee of the United States Post Office Department.

Miss Mary S. Neel has been employed in the McKeesport (Pa.) office, and is now employed there. In 1919 two depositors in the Postal Savings living in the McKeesport district had the same name—Frank Bernat. Both had accounts in the Postal Savings System. One of them presented certain funds and was given postal-savings certificates, properly numbered, by Miss Neel in the post office. However, some clerk—it never has been definitely proven that Miss Neel made the notation—but some clerk recorded these certificates to the other number. Some months later the second depositor came in and was told that there was some discrepancy as to his account and was asked to check over his certificates. He stated he had lost certain certificates, and duplicates were made out and given to him, and in due time both the originals and the duplicates were cashed. This depositor then went to his home in Czechoslovakia.

Mr. ARENTZ. In the report by the inspector it is stated that Miss Neel used the correct account, No. 1208, on the certificates, and she entered the account number on the stubs of these certificates as 2898. I could not quite make it clear in my mind whether that was corrected further on in the report of the inspector. If so, it is clear that Miss Neel was not negligent in her duties and should be reimbursed.

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. I think it is admitted she could not be proven responsible for the placing of these certificates to the credit of the wrong man. She did issue the certificates correctly. An effort was made to collect from the man who had gone back to Czechoslovakia and that could not be done and he did not refund the money. They called on Miss Neel and she paid this money out of her salary by monthly payments.

This bill has been favorably reported four times by the Committee on Claims, but it has never been reached on the floor of the House. I hope my friend will not object at this time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, directed to pay to Mary S. Neel, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $459, which she was compelled to pay on account of error in payment of postal-savings certificates.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

D. EMMETT HAMILTON

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 5242) for the relief of D. Emmett Hamilton.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. STAFFORD. Reserving the right to object, this bill seeks to repay a star-route carrier for extra poundage carried during a portion of his 4-year contract. Under the law, where conditions changed as they changed here, he might have asked the department to be relieved of the additional burden and a new contract entered into. There is no question, as far as the facts in this case are shown by the record, that the amount of mail increased. When he took a contract for four years, or whatever time he did, the usual time being four years under the star-route contracts, he could carry it on horseback.

By reason of the development of some mining operations in this district the poundage of mail increased considerably, and he was obliged to purchase a team of horses and a wagon. His estimate, however, is beyond all possibility of allowance. He puts in his estimate a return based upon the added poundage. Even the added poundage did not require him to undertake to give more hours to the employment. It is true he was obliged to spend more money for a team and equipment, and I think he should be allowed for that. It is true also the mileage was increased by reason of the opening of some additional mining camps, caused by the opening of these mines, but I could not subscribe to any amount as suggested, $4,599, and particularly with interest, because we never allow interest.

Mr. MAY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes.

Mr. MAY. Will the gentleman please note the fact that the contract was let by the Government based on the carriage of mail over this road by horseback, with a contract rating of 35 pounds of mail, and that it increased according to all of the evidence to 195 pounds. Now, taking it in that same proportion and increasing the price to $617, in the same proportion as 35 pounds is to 195 pounds, would it not make the contract price, based on that proportion, equivalent to a sum in excess of his entire claim?

Mr. STAFFORD. If the poundage had increased so that it did not require more than the carrying of it by horseback, I could not subscribe to allowing him 1 cent, because the star-route carrier when he enters into a contract undertakes to fill that contract for the 4-year period no matter whether there is an increase or a decrease in the amount of mail carried. But here the carrier was obliged by reason of the tremendous excess to adopt different equipment, and I am willing to compensate him in that particular.

Mr. ARENTZ. If the gentleman is adverse to paying interest, why not eliminate that?

Mr. MAY. I will be glad to do that.

Mr. ARENTZ. This star-route carrier had to deliver mail to a post office which was established by the Post Office Department, and he was directed by the Post Office Department to carry mail from the beginning of his route up to this new post office. He could not do that on horseback, and in his spare time he had to build this road. He had to carry this additional mail in a cart or wagon, and surely if the original contract was based on 4.8 cents per pound we should not ask this man to carry it for 1.6 cents per pound.

Mr. STAFFORD. But if the added mail had permitted him to carry it by horseback then he would not be entitled to any relief, because, as I have said, a star-route carrier is supposed to fulfill his contract during the whole of the 4-year period, no matter whether there is an increase or a decrease in the poundage.

Mr. ARENTZ. What does the gentleman think he is entitled to?

Mr. STAFFORD. He is entitled to compensation for the equipment.

Mr. ARENTZ. What is the measurement of payment to this man? I have studied this bill and studied it. What is the measurement of payment to this man and how are we to pay him?

Mr. BLACK. I think the amount set forth in the bill represents the amount which the Government would have paid the man under his contract if they had known there would be this increase in poundage and the necessity for this new equipment. Then we must bear in mind the added distance covered by this carrier. He carried mail half as far again as he contracted to carry it, and all he is asking is that he be paid for the carriage of this extra poundage over that extra distance, in addition to building the road.

Mr. STAFFORD. There are thousands of cases in the administration of the star-route service throughout the country where the carriers are not allowed—never have been allowed—one additional cent by reason of the increase in the poundage. However, it seems this case is singular by reason of the fact that the increase in mail poundage obliged the man to carry the mail by a different sort of equipment. But, as I stated originally, he should have gone to the department and said:

Conditions have changed. I want to be released or a new contract made.

I am exempting him from that oversight, but I think $4,599.64 is out of all proportion. I think we would be most liberal if we should make this allowance $3,000, in view of the fact we have never passed relief for this kind of case.

Mr. MAY. If the gentleman will offer that as an amendment, I shall accept it.

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Treasurer of the United States is hereby authorized and directed to pay, out of any funds in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $4,599.64 with 6 per cent interest to D. Emmett Hamilton, being the sum due him for carrying additional mail on route No. 29449, and not covered in his then existing contract with the Post Office Department, and which additional mail forced upon him by the Postmaster General caused the claimant undue financial loss and hardship.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following amendment: Strike out in line 5, "$4,599.64" and insert "$3,000," and strike out the phrase in the same line with "with 6 per cent interest"; and then, after the word "Hamilton," strike out the words "being the sum due him," and insert in lieu thereof the words "in full settlement."

The Clerk read the amendment, as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. STAFFORD: In line 5, strike out "$4,599.64" and insert "$3,000"; strike out the words "with 6 per cent interest"; after the word "Hamilton," insert "in full settlement"; and strike out, in line 6, the words "being the sum due him."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

STEVE FEKETE

The Clerk called the next bill on the Private Calendar, H. R. 5259, for the relief of Steve Fekete.

Mr. BACHMANN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I do so to ask unanimous consent of the House that this bill may be referred back to the Committee on Claims so that it may be amended and redrafted to state the facts. In its present form we can not tell for what the claimant seeks to recover this money.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Speaker, I object to that. I think the bill fully sets forth all the necessary information.

Mr. BACHMANN. Then, I object to the consideration of the bill.

Mr. CLANCY. Will the gentleman withhold his objection a moment?

Mr. BACHMANN. I reserve the right to object, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BACHMANN. I yield.

Mr. BLANTON. I want to say to the gentleman from New York [Mr. BLACK] that the gentleman from West Virginia has some very pertinent and necessary amendments prepared. If the gentleman from New York will agree that these amendments will be acceptable and will be put on the bill, then I know my friend from West Virginia will not object.

Mr. BLACK. I have great respect for both of the gentlemen, and if the gentleman will suggest what his amendments are, I may go along with him.

Mr. BACHMANN. I expected to do so, but you are setting forth here a principle that I am sure the chairman of the Committee on Claims would not want to establish, and we would establish such a principle if we passed the bill in its present form. I do not believe the gentleman would report out a bill from his committee involving the principle that is involved in this bill.

Mr. BLACK. What are the gentleman's suggestions?

Mr. BACHMANN. In order not to take the time now, I ask unanimous consent that it be referred back to the committee and I will give the gentleman the amendments which I think ought to go in the bill.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Speaker, I would like to accommodate the gentleman, but I do not like all this mystery about it. We have heard a couple of political speeches here to-day——

Mr. BLANTON. The bill will have to be rewritten, because there are a number of amendments that will have to go in the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from West Virginia asks unanimous consent that the bill be rereferred to the committee for the purpose of having certain amendments added to the bill. Is there objection?

Mr. CLANCY. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I wish to state that this is a bill of my colleague from Michigan [Mr. McLEOD]. The gentleman is unable to be here this afternoon. It is a bill for the return of a $500 bond given to produce an alien and the alien was not produced, and I withdraw my objection to the motion to rerefer to the committee for further consideration.

Mr. BLANTON. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. McLEOD], if he were here, would not object to these amendments.

Mr. BLACK. I will accept the amendments, so far as I am concerned, on the gentleman's responsibility, because of the faith I have in the gentleman, rather than go through this rigamarole.

Mr. BACHMANN. Does the gentleman want to go through the amendments now?

Mr. BLACK. Yes.

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay to Steve Fekete, of Detroit, Mich., the sum of $500, which was the amount of a bond given to the United States to insure the departure of an alien, which bond was subsequently declared breached by the Department of Labor and the money covered into the Treasury.

Mr. BACHMANN. Mr. Speaker, instead of offering that amendment may I move to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert the following:

The Clerk read, as follows:

That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay to Steve Fekete, of Detroit, Mich., the sum of $500, which was the amount of a bail bond given to the United States on January 13, 1928, to insure the departure of John Opalenik, an alien, which bond was declared forfeited by the Department of Labor prior to the time the alien was apprehended and deported.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

HARDEN F. TAYLOR

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 5267) to authorize and direct the Comptroller General to settle and allow the claim of Harden F. Taylor for services rendered to the Bureau of Fisheries.

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Comptroller General of the United States be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to settle and allow the claim of Harden F. Taylor in the sum of $500 for services rendered to the Bureau of Fisheries in the preparation of a manuscript on the refrigeration of fish, notwithstanding provisions of existing law.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

FRANK BAYER

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 5272) for the relief of Frank Bayer.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

Mr. ARENTZ. Reserving the right to object, the question is whether or not there is an affidavit giving the value of the apparatus and the kind of the apparatus, and so forth. You say the value was $500. What did the apparatus consist of, and is there an affidavit of proof?

Mr. BLACK. I see by the report that this was allowed by the Secretary of the Navy. We did not investigate that, but recommended the passage of the bill. We did not go into it. We were in no better position to ascertain the value than the Navy Department. I agree with the gentleman that it seems a little high.

Mr. ARENTZ. There is a similar bill here where the report contains no proof.

Mr. BLACK. The Navy Department must have made some inquiry as to the value, and they recommended the passage of the bill.

Mr. ARENTZ. Since the gentleman from New York, chairman of the committee, is satisfied, we must be. But I question the advisability of passing these bills without some proof.

Mr. PATTERSON. I will say this, that in the last Congress the same complaint was raised. I thought we should reimburse to some extent.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. BLANTON). Is there objection to the bill?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $500 to Frank Bayer, in payment for certain radio apparatus belonging to Frank Bayer and seized by officers of the United States Navy on August 9, 1917, at 2270 Bathgate Avenue, New York City.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

BLANCHE KNIGHT

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 5283) for the relief of Blanche Knight.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. BACHMANN. Reserving the right to object, I think this is a meritorious bill. I think there is a liability on the Government in this case, but I would like to ask the chairman a question. The bill seeks to refer this bill to the Employees' Compensation Commission. The husband of this woman was not in the employ of the Government. I would like to inquire of the chairman of the committee if it would not be better procedure to bring in a bill for a certain amount stipulated and pass it in that form?

Mr. PARKER of Georgia. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BACHMANN. I yield.

Mr. PARKER of Georgia. This bill was introduced by the late Mr. Rutherford.

Mr. BACHMANN. I so understand; and I think it is a meritorious bill.

Mr. STAFFORD. May I interpose there?

Mr. BACHMANN. Certainly.

Mr. STAFFORD. I have given considerable attention to this bill because it was introduced by our deceased colleague Mr. Rutherford, arising out of an accident in his district. The record shows that our deceased colleague took a particular interest in this killing of a helpless negro, who was returning from church, by prohibition-enforcement officers. I think, after a close reading of the report, that it was an accident in which the deceased was in no way to blame.

I am following the suggestion of the gentleman from West Virginia. Here is a widow who was only married——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair understood the gentleman from West Virginia was preferring a unanimous-consent request.

Mr. BACHMANN. Mr. Speaker, I reserved the right to object, but when I got to the point of suggesting a unanimous-consent request, I yielded to the gentleman from Wisconsin.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. If the request is granted, that would end the further consideration of this bill.

Mr. STAFFORD. But I wish to go along under a reservation of objection, Mr. Speaker.

Here is a case where this widow was only married to this elderly colored man, who was over 60 years old, three months. The deceased left a number of minor children by a former marriage. It is customary to vote $5,000 in such cases, but I am more concerned in the welfare of the minor children of the deceased colored man who was shot by a prohibition officer.

I have prepared an amendment, and I invite the close consideration of the gentleman from Georgia and also the chairman of the committee to it. I would suggest that $1,000 be given to the widow, and $4,000, or such sum as the House may wish to fix, to the duly appointed guardians of the minor children under the age of 12 years of said Sam Knight. If he had lived, he naturally would have continued to give his services for the benefit of the minor children. They are very young. There are four children under 12 years of age. I want this money not to go to the widow, who may perhaps throw the children to one side; but I would give her $1,000 and give $4,000 to the guardian of these children.

Mr. BLACK. Of course, the best method, if it were not for the fact that we are loading up the Compensation Commission with work that they should not carry, would be to have this paid through the Compensation Commission, because every month the $50 would be given to the widow, and there would be some inquiry as to whether the children were taken care of or not. Unless the gentleman can think of some better way of relieving the needs of the children, I would be disposed to go along with the provisions of this bill and have the Compensation Commission take care of it.

Mr. STAFFORD. But what assurance have we that this widow will spend this monthly allowance for the support of these children?

Mr. BLACK. The Compensation Commission is in a better position to find that out than we are. There is no other agency to do it.

Mr. STAFFORD. But the Compensation Commission will not require the widow to look after the children. I want to vote $4,000 to a guardian for the benefit of the children.

Mr. BLACK. Of course, the widow will be the guardian.

Mr. STAFFORD. Not necessarily so. In any event, she would have to account to the court for the administration of this $4,000.

Mr. BACHMANN. And she would have to give a bond.

Mr. STAFFORD. There are four children under 12 years of age.

Mr. BACHMANN. There are eight altogether.

Mr. STAFFORD. There are eight altogether, but one, 24, is working, and another is 16.

Mr. PARKER of Georgia. If the gentleman will permit, I will accept the amendment if it meets with the approval of the committee.

Mr. BACHMANN. May I suggest the gentleman from Wisconsin have his amendment read?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. BACHMANN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object——

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to read the proposed amendment.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. STAFFORD. The amendment that I propose is as follows:

That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $1,000 to Blanche Knight, widow of Sam Knight, who was killed by a Federal prohibition agent on August 1, 1930, at Macon, Ga.; and the sum of $4,000 to be paid to the duly appointed guardian of the minor children, under the age of 12 years, of said Sam Knight.

Mr. BACHMANN. I think we should provide that this is in full settlement of all claims against the United States, so that we will end this claim once and for all.

Mr. STAFFORD. I think that is understood, and it would rather involve the amendment.

Mr. BACHMANN. Mr. Speaker, with the understanding that this amendment will be agreed to, I make no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the United States Employees' Compensation Commission be, and it is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of money not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $50 per month for 100 months to Blanche Knight, widow of Sam Knight, who was killed without cause by a Federal prohibition agent on August 1, 1930, at Macon, Ga.

Mr. STAFFORD offered the following amendment as a substitute:

Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert in lieu thereof the following: "That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $1,000 to Blanche Knight, widow of Sam Knight, who was killed by a Federal prohibition agent on August 1, 1930, at Macon, Ga.; and the sum of $4,000 to be paid to the duly appointed guardian of the minor children, under the age of 12 years, of said Sam Knight."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

MARY FORD CONRAD

The Clerk called the next bill, H. R. 5794, to extend the benefits of the employers' liability act of September 7, 1916, to Mary Ford Conrad.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. EATON of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the right to object.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. EATON of Colorado. I will.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I assume the gentleman will recognize the difference between cases where the claimant was injured after the United States compensation act was passed in 1916 and failed, because he was not acquainted with the law, to make his claim within the statutory period of 60 days or a year and those cases that are on the calendar where the injury occurred prior to the enactment of the United States compensation act, say, in 1914, and they are seeking to have that act made retroactive. There are those two different characters of cases on the calendar. I make the distinction, and I think it is a good rule to follow, that where the claimant has been injured after the date of the enactment of the law and was ignorant of its provisions, and therefore failed to make his claim within the statutory period, that those claimants should be permitted to avail themselves of the benefits of the compensation acts with the benefits accruing from the date of the passage of the private act. I do not believe we are doing any violence to the law but that we are doing a justice to these claimants. There have been two such cases on the calendar to-day, and I think we are unduly strict if we are going to lay down the rule and say that because some claimant was injured after the enactment of this act and, perchance, was not acquainted with its provisions that he should be barred from having his day in court. It may be that the claimant lived in some distant part of the country and did not know there was a United States compensation law. Under those circumstances I do not think it is right to bar him from any recovery and thus throw him upon the mercy of the locality in which he lived.

When we throw open the floodgates of the act of 1916 to all those who were injured before and received compensation under the prior law of 1908, I think we are making a grave mistake. As to those cases we may well take the position that we should not permit them to come in at this time, especially in view of the present condition of the Treasury.

I ask the gentleman from Colorado whether he does not see the fairness and justice of allowing those claimants who were injured after 1916 to come in and present their claims before the Compensation Commission, waiving only the statutory limitation contained in that law, which provides that such claims must be presented within a certain time. That is all this bill seeks to do, and if the consideration of this bill is permitted I would suggest, in order to protect the Treasury, in conformance with the general policy, that we add at the end of the bill the proviso that no benefits shall be asked prior to the enactment of this act.

Mr. PATTERSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes.

Mr. PATTERSON. This has been the customary policy followed by the Congress, is it not? We have been passing bills of this kind which just gives a man his day in court.

Mr. STAFFORD. That was the policy in the last Congress, the uniform policy in the last Congress at least. When the Private Calendar was under consideration the last time, one or two bills were objected to by the gentleman from Colorado, unwittingly, I think, because he did not carry that distinction in mind. I do not think the gentleman would go as far as to say that when a man was in the employ of the Government, was injured and did not know that there was some relief measure that gave him protection that he should be barred for all time from asking relief.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. EATON of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, I object.

SHERBURNE MERCANTILE CO.

The Clerk called the next bill, H. R. 4143, for the relief of the Sherburne Mercantile Co.

There being no objection, the bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $725.80 to the Sherburne Mercantile Co., of Browning, Mont., in full settlement of their claim against the Government for supplies furnished Indians under the jurisdiction of the Blackfeet Agency during the fiscal year 1918–19.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider laid on the table.

C. B. BELLOWS

The Clerk called the next bill, H. R. 615, for the relief of C. B. Bellows.

There being no objection, the bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay to C. B. Bellows, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $1,141 in full settlement of damages sustained on January 31, 1930, at the Municipal Airport, Long Beach, Calif., when the hangar owned by said C. B. Bellows was damaged by the crash of 0–2–U–I landplane No. 7543, operated under the jurisdiction of the Navy Department.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider laid on the table.

PHYLLIS PRATT

The Clerk called the next bill, H. R. 618, for the relief of Phyllis Pratt and Harold Louis Pratt, a minor.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. BACHMANN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to inquire as to how this accident occurred?

Mr. EVANS of California. Mr. Speaker, this accident occurred by an Army plane coming in collision with a transport plane between Los Angeles and San Diego. The transport plane was proceeding southward toward Mexico, carrying some 8 or 10 passengers. This Army officer, flying under orders of the War Department from the San Diego base, apparently was doing stunts.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman yield for a question in that particular?

Mr. EVANS of California. Pardon me just a minute. He dove toward this plane some two or three times, according to the witnesses, and finally dove into it and wrecked the plane, killed all the passengers of the transport plane, and, of course, killed himself. This Congress has approved at least one other bill——

Mr. BACHMANN. I was not so much interested in that phase of it. I think this is a meritorious claim.

Mr. EVANS of California. There is no question about it.

Mr. BACHMANN. But the question is that the report does not fully disclose as to how the accident occurred or where this party was that was killed. Was he in the transport plane?

Mr. EVANS of California. He was a passenger in the transport plane, and this provides relief for his wife and minor children.

Mr. BACHMANN. I have no objection.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I regret I have to take a contrary position to that of my distinguished friend from West Virginia, and also have to take exception to the statement made by the gentleman from California who says that the Army flyer was flying under orders. I direct the gentleman's attention to the report of the Secretary of War found on the first page of the report, where he states Lieutenant Keefer "while on an unauthorized flight."

Mr. EVANS of California. In what report is that?

Mr. BACHMANN. The paragraph next to the bottom.

Mr. STAFFORD. "While on an unauthorized flight in a United States Army airplane on April 21, 1929, in San Diego." He states further "that the collision was the result of a maneuver unwarranted, illegal"——

Mr. EVANS of California. Of course, it was illegal.

Mr. STAFFORD. And inexcusable.

Here is the difficulty I have with this claim. It was not in the performance of his duties or was not performed under orders, but he was using the plane without authority. Does the gentleman wish to take the position that if an Army officer or even a private should appropriate some article belonging to the Army, like an automobile or a revolver, and beyond his authority should use such article in a careless manner, the Government should be held responsible for his acts?

Mr. BACHMANN. Will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes.

Mr. BACHMANN. The reason I say this is a meritorious claim is because the Maddux Air Lines recovered several thousand dollars in the last Congress for this same accident, if I remember, and some of the people who were killed there also recovered because of an act of Congress in the last session. This is another one of the passengers who was in that plane, and if the last Congress has reimbursed the Maddux Air Lines for the cost of the plane and has provided for the families of the other passengers in the Maddux Air Lines plane, why now should we raise the question which the gentleman from Wisconsin has just raised?

Mr. STAFFORD. If such a bill passed, it was passed without a full statement of the facts, as now disclosed by the Secretary of War, and I am unaware of any such legislation having passed; and out of deference to the gentleman's position I will ask to have this passed over, because under the present form of the bill I could not subscribe to this doctrine.

Mr. EVANS of California. Will the gentleman withhold his objection for a moment?

Mr. STAFFORD. I withhold it.

Mr. EVANS of California. This is the report of the board of Army officers that made an investigation of this collision, and I am reading from the report itself:

A board of officers was appointed for the purpose of making an investigation and reporting upon the property damage claims submitted by the Maddux Air Lines (Inc.), and their findings are in part as follows:

"That the collision was the result of a maneuver unwarranted, illegal"—

Of course, it was unwarranted and illegal—and inexcusable.

Of course, it was inexcusable.

Mr. STAFFORD. Why was it illegal unless it was unauthorized?

Mr. EVANS of California. I want the gentleman to get this whole report:

Yet without malicious intent on the part of Lieut. Howard Keefer while on an authorized flight—

Not unauthorized, but authorized—in a United States Army airplane on April 21, 1929, in San Diego, and unavoidable by the Maddux air liner.

Mr. STAFFORD. I wish to confess to the gentleman and to the House that I was in error. I read "authorized" as "unauthorized" because of the word "'an." I can see now the position taken by the gentleman from West Virginia.

Mr. BACHMANN. Will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. STAFFORD. And if this injury happened as a result of an authorized flight, then, of course, it is different.

Mr. BACHMANN. And we paid for the loss of that plane in the last Congress by a bill appropriating $44,000.

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to Phyllis Pratt and Harold Louis Pratt, a minor, the sum of $5,000 as reimbursement to them for the loss suffered by them in the death of their husband and father, Louis Daniel Pratt, now deceased, whose death occurred on April 21, 1929, without fault on his part or on their part, through the collision of a tri-motored Ford airplane belonging to the Maddux Air Lines (Inc.), of Los Angeles, Calif., bearing factory No. 5-AT-10, license number NC 9636, near San Diego, Calif., with an airplane belonging to the War Department of the United States, which was then and there operated in a wrongful and negligent manner by Lieut. Howard Keefer, a United States pilot, then and there flying under orders and in line of duty.

Mr. HOOPER. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike out the last word, and if any Member objects to my handling the matter in this way, I shall have to bear the objection. I do this to call attention of the committee to something which escaped me during the consideration of these bills heretofore.

It would have been of no avail for me to be present, although I was absent from the Chamber but a few minutes in the objections made to this class of bills by the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. EATON]. I think it is only due to me to say a few words about the person whom I represent in this bill.

John Barnum, a young man residing in Hillsdale County, Michigan, was in 1919 working for the United States Shipping Board, sailing the Red Sea. There came a spell of terribly hot weather. He was taken ill as the result, and they brought him home in a very bad condition indeed, a condition that has grown worse and worse as time went on.

This boy knew nothing about what his rights were; he was totally ignorant of them. Finally, in 1923 he took up the matter with my predecessor, Hon. Arthur B. Williams. Mr. Williams died, and after a brief lapse of time, the matter came to my notice, and ever since 1925 I have been struggling every year to get compensation for this young man. It has been my purpose to have jurisdiction conferred upon the proper board to have this matter heard, to have it determined whether or not under all the circumstances that existed at the time the young man ought to have his day in court.

I have seen the young man every year when I have been at home, sometimes more than once; he comes to my office with his aged parents, who are wholly unable to take care of him.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOOPER. I yield.

Mr. STAFFORD. I think at another session we will be able to adopt a policy that will enable us to consider not only the bill the gentleman speaks of but certain other bills that have been objected to on the Consent Calendar. I know that the gentleman from Colorado wishes to do right by all of these claimants.

Mr. HOOPER. I am glad to have this assurance from the gentleman from Wisconsin.

If you could see and know this young man, you would feel the same sympathy for his unfortunate condition that I do. His case is wholly meritorious and has been held so at least twice by the full Committee on Claims. I hope the gentleman from Colorado may reconsider the policy announced by him and permit justice to be done this claimant.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

Mr. EATON of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes out of order to answer the statements of the gentleman from Michigan.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Colorado?

There was no objection.

Mr. HOOPER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. EATON of Colorado. I yield.

Mr. HOOPER. I am not in any sense impugning the motives or honesty of the gentleman from Colorado in making these objections. I know the gentleman is doing in good faith what he is doing. I simply want to call the attention of the House to one of these cases which seems to be a real injustice that arises from the manner of handling claims of this sort.

Mr. EATON of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, there are four different types of cases on the calendar to-day. There were two different types upon the Private Calendar last week. Objection was made to both types last week. Objection has been made to each type to-day. All seek to give some one a right under the Employees' Compensation Commission which he has either lost or never did have. The committee has reported favorably upon all of the bills. Different Members have objected to different types of bills. My purpose to-day is to see that each bill is given exactly the same treatment. I have no doubt that those who have been objecting and possibly the members of the Committee on Claims will have a meeting some time during the week and classify those claims and consider particularly that type which seems to have the greatest equity in them—that is, those who, for some reason, through no fault of their own, failed to avail themselves of their right under the compensation law. But, as it now stands it is my intention in objecting to see that all are treated the same way; and if one is permitted to apply to the Employees' Compensation Commission, the balance should be given the same right. If one is denied, all should be denied.

Mr. SWING. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. EATON of Colorado. I yield.

Mr. SWING. The gentleman does not want the great United States Government, in dealing with its individual citizens, to deny them their "day in court" by availing itself of some abstract technicality? The very purpose of this Private Calendar day is to do something which existing law does not permit to be done, in order that even-handed justice may be granted to individual citizens. If we are here to uphold existing law in every letter and word, then not a single one of these bills could be passed. All of them would have to be denied. The very purpose of this calendar is to permit, in contravention of existing law, the doing of what we, as between man and man, recognize as justice to helpless citizens for injury done them for which this Government is responsible and for which they have no other forum to which they can look for relief.

Mr. EATON of Colorado. The gentleman from California should spend a little more time in the Chamber during the consideration of the Private Calendar.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, regular order.

BLANCHE KNIGHT

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to return to H. R. 5283 for the purpose of amending the title.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Wisconsin?

There was no objection.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the title of the bill (H. R. 5283) be amended to read: "For the relief of Blanche Knight and certain minor children of Sam Knight, deceased."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

WESTERN ELECTRIC CO. (INC.)

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 691) for the relief of the Western Electric Co. (Inc.).

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. PATTERSON. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I do not see the author of this bill on the floor, and, having some doubt about the bill, I shall object for the present.

ESTATE OF WHITE B. MILLER

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 872) for the relief of the estate of White B. Miller.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. BACHMANN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I call the attention of the Members of the House to the fact that here is a private bill providing for the payment of $25,000. I doubt seriously whether bills carrying that amount of money should be considered on the Private Calendar rather than in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union. There may be some merit to this claim, and I do not doubt that there is. This widow of the deceased is claiming that the sum of $25,000 be paid because her husband rendered certain legal services to the Government at a time when he was employed by the Government receiving a salary of $10,000 a year. I do not think that in the consideration of the Private Calendar, considering the large amount that is being here asked, we should consider a bill in that amount.

Mr. McREYNOLDS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BACHMANN. I yield.

Mr. McREYNOLDS. I would like to ask the gentleman how this bill could be considered if it can not be considered on the Private Calendar.

Mr. BACHMANN. I am not so familiar with the parliamentary situation, but I assume the gentleman could secure a rule and have the bill come before the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. McREYNOLDS. That is absolutely impossible. I am sure the gentleman does not want to do any injustice. We would be delighted to have this bill tried on its merits anywhere. These are the facts, if the gentleman will permit. Mr. Miller was employed in 1923, specially, in what is known as the Savannah cases. He was specially employed to represent the Government in those cases. The cases were voluminous. It took several years before he was able to get through with them. He had a special employment. He was only given the title of special attorney so that he might act. He was very successful in every one of the cases.

Practically every one of those cases, in connection with tax frauds, and so forth, went to the court of appeals, and he won every one of them. In one of those cases he collected $500,000 for the Government.

Mr. BACHMANN. Will the gentleman permit an inquiry?

Mr. McREYNOLDS. Yes.

Mr. BACHMANN. Was not Mr. Miller at that time receiving a salary from the Government, by reason of his position, of $10,000?

Mr. McREYNOLDS. No, sir. He had a special contract with the Government. I know the report states that, but I have a copy of Mr. Holland's letter. He received $1,000 a month one year as counsel in that particular line of cases.

Mr. BACHMANN. Was he employed by the Government at $10,000 a year as special assistant to the United States attorney?

Mr. McREYNOLDS. No, sir. He was employed as a special assistant to the United States Attorney General in these particular cases, and was given this title so he could act in an official way. He was not a regular Assistant Attorney General.

Mr. BACHMANN. I want to direct attention to the report of the Attorney General. He says:

At the time of his appointment in the Cannon cases Mr. Miller was already receiving $10,000 a year.

Mr. McREYNOLDS. That is the report.

Mr. BACHMANN. He was employed as special Assistant Attorney General. There are many attorneys employed by the Government on a salary who save the Government many millions of dollars.

Mr. McREYNOLDS. This is what I want to direct the gentleman's attention to. He was only employed in these particular cases, just like you as a lawyer would be employed by this client and employed by another client in another case. He was not to give his entire time to the Government. He was merely employed in these cases. Let me read just what the Attorney General wrote the Budget Department in asking that this be included in the Budget:

It would have been inadvisable for any attorney regularly employed in the Government service to handle these cases, for the reason that Mr. Blair, the then Commissioner of Internal Revenue, was involved as one of the parties. Rather than appoint some other special assistant to handle the cases, Mr. Miller was appointed because of his previous experience in handling tax cases for the department, and also because of his proven ability and tact in handling cases involving a Federal official without public criticism.

That was Mr. Blair, who was the internal-revenue collector.

In addition, the Cannon cases were particularly difficult ones. They presented a hard question of law and necessitated months of investigation into a complexity of facts and accounting matters.

He was employed on account of his particular knowledge of these matters.

Mr. BACHMANN. By whom was he employed?

Mr. McREYNOLDS. I will tell the gentleman.

Mr. BACHMANN. As I understand the report, he was employed by the Attorney General in 1926.

Mr. McREYNOLDS. He was employed by Mr. Rush L. Holland, Assistant Attorney General.

Mr. BACHMANN. Was there any contract at that time as to the amount he was to be paid?

Mr. McREYNOLDS. This is what the Attorney General wrote:

Your appointment, dated March 17, 1926, as a special assistant to the Attorney General in the case of Cannon et al., Executors, v. Bailey, Ex-Collector, pending in the eastern district of North Carolina, is hereby amended to the extent that the phraseology—

"Your compensation will be determined by the Attorney General upon the conclusion of your services"— is changed to read—

"You will be allowed reasonable compensation at the conclusion of your services."

Mr. BACHMANN. Has there ever been an agreement on the amount of that compensation?

Mr. McREYNOLDS. Yes.

Mr. BACHMANN. What amount was agreed upon?

Mr. McREYNOLDS. Soon after these services were terminated that was agreed upon. The gentleman will remember that when Mr. Miller was brought into these cases they had been decided adversely to the Government. Over $2,000,000 was involved, and the plaintiffs in those cases were represented by the firm of Justice Hughes, in New York. Mr. Miller came into the cases, and after some three years of service and after saving the Government $1,080,000, he then concluded his services in these particular cases and presented his bill to Attorney General Sargent, and at that time they agreed, as my record shows, that $50,000 would be a reasonable fee, and $3,000 was paid.

Mr. BACHMANN. How was that money paid?

Mr. McREYNOLDS. By check, I presume.

Mr. BACHMANN. By the Attorney General?

Mr. McREYNOLDS. I could not tell the gentleman.

Mr. BACHMANN. Why does the gentleman come here with a bill requiring the Congress to pay this amount if he was paid $3,000 by the Attorney General?

Mr. McREYNOLDS. I will say this: During Attorney General Sargent's time they paid Mr. Miller these fees without coming to Congress. The gentleman broke into my line of thought.

This agreement was made, and then the administration changed and Mr. Mitchell came in. After he had made the agreement to pay him $50,000 as a reasonable fee for the three years of service, and after having saved the Government over $1,000,000, Mr. Miller died and his sons came here for a settlement, and Mr. Mitchell, or the Attorney General's Department, agreed to pay $25,000. These sons then agreed to that, because they thought it would be included in the Budget. There was no such suggestion up to that time that this would not be done, because his other fees had been included in the Budget without having to come to Congress. With this in view the Attorney General wrote the Director of the Budget explaining the facts and asking that $25,000 be included for Mr. Miller, and I have a copy of the letter in my files.

These young men agreed to this because they thought they would get their money immediately; but the Director of the Budget held that he could not do this, because he had been styled Assistant Attorney General, and the statute only provided $10,000 for the Assistant Attorney General, and stated it would be necessary to have an act of Congress.

This bill passed the Senate during the last session and was here on the floor of the House, and I know the gentleman was here that night, and it was not objected to by the gentleman at that time.

This is a just claim. These people have been held out of their money for two years. They are entitled to it, and I know that the gentleman, as a lawyer, appreciates that this would be a reasonable fee for anyone who managed these cases and had saved the Government over $1,000,000.

The work took practically all of his time. It required his office force, which he furnished himself at his own expense, and I trust that the gentleman will not object at this time, because I have no other way of getting my day in court. If I had, I would welcome the time to come before this House and show these facts, because I feel it is an honest and just claim and one that ought to be paid.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BACHMANN. I yield.

Mr. BLANTON. The most objectionable feature about the whole situation is that this gentleman, Mr. Miller, was employed by the Government as an Assistant Attorney General on a salary of $10,000 a year, which is not a small salary. It is big enough to pay the biggest Congressman in the House of Representatives or the biggest Senator in the Senate. The biggest Senator you have over there gets just $10,000, and the biggest man you have in the House just gets $10,000. This man was getting $10,000 from the Government. What was he supposed to give the Government for his salary? Why, every service that he could render. The gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. BACHMANN] is getting a salary of $10,000. He is supposed to give his best service to the country. If he saves $1,000,000 here to-day objecting to bills that are not meritorious, I take it, under this argument, we ought to pass a bill paying him $50,000 more to compensate him for this saving to the Government, when he has done only his duty.

It was the duty of this Assistant Attorney General to save the Government money that ought not to be paid out. He was getting a big salary, a congressional salary, a senatorial salary. What was he to do for it? Nothing? No. It was his duty to do everything within his power to save money for the Government.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. I yield.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. I think we all understand what salary the Members of the Senate and the House are drawing, and what I would like to know is whether or not this man was drawing a salary of $10,000 a year during the time for which his widow seeks to get this additional $25,000?

Mr. BLANTON. Yes; according to this letter from the Attorney General.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. I know what the letter says, but as I understand the gentleman who is the proponent of this legislation, he was not drawing a salary of $10,000 a year.

Mr. BLANTON. Then you can not believe the Attorney General of the United States. Let me read what the Attorney General says.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. I have already read that and I know what he says, but I would like to know whether the letter is correct or whether the gentleman who is seeking to secure the passage of this bill is correct?

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, this kind of case ought not to be called up here and passed in five minutes without bringing the record here. The gentleman from Tennessee ought to have the right to be properly heard—and there will come a day when he will be heard on the matter, when the whole record can be brought in here, and I must say I commend the attitude of the gentleman from West Virginia that a bill involving this sum ought not to be passed by unanimous consent.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. BACHMANN. Mr. Speaker, I want to be fair, and I shall reserve the right to object, if I may be permitted to do so, so that the gentleman may be heard.

Mr. RAMSPECK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BACHMANN. I yield.

Mr. RAMSPECK. Mr. Speaker, I investigated this matter for the Committee on Claims, and the facts, briefly, are just these: This man Miller was employed by Attorney General Sargent on a salary basis, at first, in the so-called Savannah rum conspiracy cases. Before he had concluded that they made a separate contract of employment covering the Cannon cases. In the meantime the Savannah cases were concluded, and for three years after that he worked on the Cannon cases, which were income-tax cases and for which he has never drawn but $3,000.

Attorney General Sargent by letters which my colleague, the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. McREYNOLDS] has copies of, and which I have read, and which are in the files of the Committee on Claims, agreed to pay him a reasonable compensation, to be fixed at the conclusion of the work.

It has nothing in the world to do with the salary. I know, as all lawyers know, that when a capable attorney works three years on a case involving $2,000,000, under contract made by a responsible Government official, $25,000 is a small fee. There is no question about the facts as set out in the report. This man had a contract in writing, and Attorney General Mitchell, who came in afterwards and objected to the $50,000, does recommend the payment of $25,000.

Mr. BACHMANN. If this was a contract made in the way the gentleman states, why was not the usual course of payment proceeded upon?

Mr. RAMSPECK. The Attorney General says for the reason that they have no legal authority to pay any attorney for the Government more than $10,000 a year.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. It seems to me that when boiled down, it is this: After the services for which he was to receive $10,000 a year had been terminated, unless relief is given, we see this lawyer working for three years for the Government, in which it is said he saved a large amount, and the highest officer in the Government said that he should have a reasonable fee. It has been determined that a reasonable fee is $25,000. Attorney General Sargent stepped out, and the Government is getting the services of this man, in which he saved $1,080,000, which was paid into the Treasury, and the Government is not to pay him a cent.

Mr. BACHMANN. I want to be courteous and respectful, and there may be much merit in this case, but you are asking the Government to pay his widow $25,000, and I am not going to consent to that sum of money under these circumstances.

Mr. REYNOLDS. Then object without saying anything more about it, and without taking up so much time.

Mr. BACHMANN. I object.

ROLAND ZOLESKY

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 941) for the relief of Roland Zolesky.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. BACHMANN. Reserving the right to object, will the gentleman from Wisconsin accept an amendment to make the sum $1,000?

Mr. SCHAFER. One thousand dollars is a very small sum in comparison with the amounts recommended by the Claims Committee and passed by the Congress for similar injuries. This boy had three fingers and a thumb blown off. I do not see why in this case the amount should be reduced to $1,000.

Mr. BACHMANN. This youngster only lost two fingers on one hand. He took a shell, which had not exploded, and put it on the stove in his home, and it exploded there.

Mr. SCHAFER. The gentleman as an attorney has certainly handled cases for children 8 years of age. The agents of the Federal Government left an unexploded shell with the detonator in it, and this 8-year-old child picked it up and nearly lost his life, and suffered serious permanent injury.

Mr. BACHMANN. This case was passed upon by the Supreme Court of Wisconsin, as the gentleman knows, and that court decided that there was no liability on the part of the corporation which manufactured the shells. If the gentleman will accept an amendment, striking out $2,500 and inserting $1,000, I will not object.

Mr. SCHAFER. If the gentleman has read the Wisconsin Supreme Court decision, which is incorporated in the committee report, he can not but reach the conclusion that although the supreme court decision was unfavorable to the claimant in the suit against the private corporation, it indicated that the injury resulted from the negligence of Government officials.

Mr. BACHMANN. I do not doubt that, but there is no evidence here concerning the amount of damage and the amount of suffering, and so forth.

Mr. SCHAFER. I will say to the gentleman that the Claims Committee did not think it necessary to spend a great deal of the taxpayers' money to incorporate all of the testimony before the committee in the committee report. The bill was investigated by a subcommittee, and the full Claims Committee then considered it and unanimously recommended that the bill carry $2,500.

I do not see why the gentleman wants to single out this bill and demand an unjustified, arbitrary reduction to $1,000.

Mr. BACHMANN. If the gentleman will agree to an amendment striking out $2,500 and inserting $1,000, I will make no objection.

Mr. SCHAFER. In view of the evidence and the facts and the unanimous report of the Claims Committee, I could not stultify myself and take advantage of this 8-year-old minor child who was injured through the negligence of Government officials and agree to accept the unjust amendment as proposed in order that the bill might be considered.

Mr. BACHMANN. Mr. Speaker, I object.

GEORGE C. MANSFIELD CO. AND GEORGE D. MANSFIELD

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 946) for the relief of the George C. Mansfield Co. and George D. Mansfield.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. GRISWOLD. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, this bill calls for the removal of the statute of limitations to take care of a claim of $126,000. It seems to me that if a claim for $25,000 should have further consideration, certainly a claim for $126,000 should have more consideration.

Mr. SCHAFER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GRISWOLD. I yield.

Mr. SCHAFER. The committee report indicates that this bill does not make any appropriation. It simply sends the case to the Court of Claims to determine the actual loss suffered by the claimant and liability of the Federal Government, if any, and I might inform the gentleman that a subcommittee of the Committee on Claims held extensive hearings on this bill. The bill was favorably reported out with a unanimous vote. There was no objection raised in the committee. An identical bill passed the Senate in the last session by unanimous consent. If the gentleman has carefully considered the committee report, I do not have any hesitation in believing that he will reach a conclusion that this claimant should have his day in court, particularly in view of the facts which are carefully outlined in the committee report.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. GRISWOLD. Mr. Speaker, I object.

KNUD O. FLAKNE

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 1228) to adjudicate the claim of Knud O. Flakne, a homestead settler on the drained Mud Lake bottom, in the State of Minnesota.

There being no objection the Clerk read the bill as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the following sum of money to the claimant, his heirs, assigns, or legal representative; the amount to be paid him, his heirs, assigns, or legal representative: To Knud O. Flakne, $151.60, which amount is hereby appropriated; and the Secretary of the Interior is authorized and directed to make the payment to the claimant herein named and provided for by his warrant upon the Treasury of the United States: Provided, That no agent, attorney, firm of attorneys, or any persons engaged heretofore or hereafter in preparing, presenting, or prosecuting this claim shall, directly or indirectly, receive or retain for such service in preparing, presenting, or prosecuting such claim, or for any act whatsoever in connection therewith, an amount greater than was paid to the claimant for his assignment under this act to the person for whom he has acted as agent or attorney: Provided further, That no purchaser or assignee of the claim of said claimant shall receive therefor a greater amount than was paid to the claimant for his assignment.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

UNITED STATES BANK OF ST. LOUIS, MO.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 1323) for the relief of the United States Bank of St. Louis, Mo.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration?

Mr. PATTERSON. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I will say that, according to the objections I made the other day on another bill similar to this, I think these bills should wait. They will still remain on the calendar, and I think they should wait, and probably we can consider them at some time later.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PATTERSON. I yield.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. That is just what was said in the last Congress. "Let these bills go over and we will consider them some time later." In the closing days of the last session a bill identical to this, a Senate bill for the relief of a fishing and hunting club in Maryland, was allowed to pass this House without objection, and the money has been paid. Now, here is the situation: This is a national bank with thousands of stockholders. It paid its income tax to the Government and about four years afterwards the Government's auditor said, "You charged off an amount in one year that you should not have charged off in another year. We find you owe the Government about $8,000." The bank officials replied, "All right. We will pay the Government if you will give us back the money that we paid you for the other year." The agent in charge said, "You will get the refund." The bank officials said, "Why not let us pay the balance to the Government?" but were told the Government does not keep books that way. So this bank agreed with the agent to pay twelve thousand and odd dollars, interest being added, and then stated, in paying it under protest, that it expected a refund. Not hearing from the Government, it made inquiry. The agent advised, "You will hear from Washington." They waited further and they never heard from Washington. Finally, when they did write to Washington, they were told, "You did not make a proper claim for refund within the time limit, and therefore you can not be paid." It was admitted that the Government had money that showed the tax had been paid twice.

Now, that is the situation. If the gentleman can find a more meritorious bill on the calendar to-day, where Government officials say that they owe money but they can not pay it because of the statute of limitations, I would like to have the gentleman point it out. We come here because of the statute of limitations.

Mr. PATTERSON. I will say to my good friend from Missouri that we had this very question before the House on last Friday——

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. I am not talking about last Friday. I am talking about to-day. I am talking about a bill that stands on its own bottom. I do not care what you had last Friday.

Mr. PATTERSON. When the distinguished Speaker was in the chair he made a statement, when that question was being considered, that there were over $4,000,000,000 of tax money where the statute of limitations has run, and if the door is opened there is no telling when this thing will end. I have no doubt that a number of those claims are meritorious and I do not take the position they are not.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. I want to say to the gentleman that the Speaker of the House is one Member of the House. If the Government has taxpayers' money it knows should be refunded it should be refunded.

Mr. PATTERSON. Well, I do not question that, but I object for the present.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. PATTERSON. I object.

JOE PETRAN

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 1381) for the relief of Joe Petran.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. EATON of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, I object.

ALVINA HOLLIS

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 1768) for the relief of Alvina Hollis.

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to Alvina Hollis, the sum of $5,000 in full settlement of all claims against the United States because of personal injuries sustained by the said Alvina Hollis when struck and injured on or about October 4, 1928, by a motor truck owned and operated by the Post Office Department of the United States: Provided, That no part of the amount appropriated in this act in excess of 10 per cent thereof shall be paid or delivered to or received by any agent or agents, attorney or attorneys, on account of services rendered in connection with said claim. It shall be unlawful for any agent or agents, attorney or attorneys, to exact, collect, withhold, or receive any sum of the amount appropriated in this act in excess of 10 per cent thereof on account of services rendered in connection with said claim, any contract to the contrary notwithstanding. Any person violating the provisions of this act shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and upon conviction thereof shall be fined in any sum not exceeding $1,000.

With the following committee amendment:

Page 1, line 6, strike out "$5,000" and insert in lieu thereof "$1,500."

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

SENELMA WIRKKULA

The Clerk called the next bill, H. R. 1770, for the relief of Senelma Wirkkula, also known as Selma Wirkkula.

There being no objection, the bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, and in full settlement against the Government, the sum of $10,000 to Senelma Wirkkula, also known as Selma Wirkkula, wife of Gust Henry Wirkkula, also known as Henry Wirkkula, on account of the death of the said Gust Henry Wirkkula, also known as Henry Wirkkula, who was killed by one Emmett J. White (a Federal officer, known as a Federal border patrolman, in Government service, while on duty), on June 8, 1929, while driving an automobile on a public highway near International Falls, in Koochiching County, Minn.

With the following committee amendment:

On page 1, in line 6, strike out the sign and figures "$10,000" and insert in lieu thereof the sign and figures "$5,000."

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider laid on the table.

The title was amended.

STATE NATIONAL BANK OF WILLS POINT, TEX.

The Clerk called the next bill, H. R. 2594, for the relief of the State National Bank of Wills Point, Tex.

There being no objection, the bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to redeem in favor of the State National Bank of Wills Point, Tex., three 4½ per cent United States Treasury certificates of indebtedness, Nos. 789, 790, and 791, in the denomination of $1,000 each, series TJ–1929, dated September 15, 1928, matured June 15, 1929, without interest and without presentation of the said certificates which are alleged to have been lost, stolen, or destroyed: Provided, That the said certificates shall not have been previously presented and paid and that no payment shall be made hereunder for any coupons which may have been attached to the certificates: Provided further, That said State National Bank of Wills Point, Tex., shall first file in the Treasury Department a bond in the penal sum of double the amount of the principal of said certificates in such form and with such corporate surety as may be acceptable to the Secretary of the Treasury to indemnify and save harmless the United States from any loss on account of the certificates hereinbefore described.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider laid on the table.

ANTHRACITE COAL SITUATION IN PENNSYLVANIA

Mr. BOLAND. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the anthracite-coal situation in Pennsylvania.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BOLAND. Mr. Speaker, in my State of Pennsylvania one of the chief industries, the mining of anthracite coal, faces an especially serious situation, in addition to its plight by reason of the general depression affecting all industries.

I am informed by Mr. Charles H. Dorrance, president of the Penn Anthracite Mining Co., that the report of the Department of Mines, under date of January 29, shows that during 1931 there were 216,000 tons of Russian anthracite imported into this country. From private advices from New England this tonnage is probably more nearly 350,000 tons. On a check up recently completed it is found that there are at least 30 cargoes, averaging 4,000 to 5,000 tons per steamer, which are due to arrive in New England from foreign countries before the 1st of March. A very large proportion of this is Russian Soviet coal.

It is also found that this Russian coal is being sold in the New England market for a price equal to Pennsylvania anthracite and in some cases at a slight premium over Pennsylvania anthracite. Therefore, there is nothing in connection with this situation whereby the exclusion of this coal mined by convict or indentured labor would in any way work to the detriment of the consumer in this country, but its exclusion would definitely work to the benefit of the prosperity and the employment of my constituents in Pennsylvania. Congress should seriously consider the question of excluding from importation into this country this Russian coal mined by indentured labor. I shall call this matter to the attention of the Ways and Means Committee for their consideration.

J. W. ANDERSON

The Clerk called the next bill, H. R. 2608, for the relief of J. W. Anderson.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. EATON of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, I object.

Mr. SMITH of Virginia. Will the gentleman reserve his objection?

Mr. EATON of Colorado. I will.

Mr. SMITH of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, this is the case of one J. W. Anderson. He was an employee not of the Federal Government, but an employee of the District of Columbia, a guard at the District penitentiary or workhouse in Virginia. At the time this injury occurred he was assigned to pursue certain prisoners who had escaped. In company with another guard he did so. When they arrived at the place on the railroad where these prisoners were at the time this guard undertook, in the pursuit of his duty, to jump off the train and recapture these two prisoners. In doing so he fell under the train and lost his leg.

This case has been up before. It has passed the Senate, it has been favorably reported in previous Congresses by the Claims Committee, but it did not pass the House at the last session.

However, the fact is that in the city of Washington, which has no local self-government of its own, there is what is known as the Citizens' Advisory Council, and I am informed, and the report so states, that this Citizens' Advisory Council, out of whose tax money this claim is to be paid, has recommended that it be paid.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SMITH of Virginia. I yield.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. As I understand the gentleman this man was employed by the Federal Government at the time?

Mr. SMITH of Virginia. No, sir. He was not employed by the Government, but was employed by the District of Columbia at the District workhouse located in Virginia.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Would he not be entitled to relief under the provisions of the employees' compensation act?

Mr. SMITH of Virginia. He would be entitled to relief under that act had it been in existence at the time of his injury.

Of course, had the accident happened since the compensation act was passed, he would be taken care of. Not only has the Citizens' Advisory Council, which has to pay this money, recommended it, but I am informed the Commissioners of the District of Columbia say it is a case that ought to be given special consideration. I do hope that in view of this man's condition, in view of the fact that this is the governing body of the District of Columbia—and this is the only tribunal in which his case can be tried—the gentleman will withdraw his objection and permit this claim, which is a righteous, just, and honest claim, to be considered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. EATON of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, this claim being 20 years old and having been rejected by a number of previous Congresses, I object.

EMMETT W. SOUTHWICK

The Clerk called the next bill on the Private Calendar, H. R. 2705, for the relief of Emmett W. Southwick.

Mr. EATON of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the right to object.

Mr. SWING. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. EATON of Colorado. I yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. SWING. Mr. Speaker, this is one of the cases which the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. EATON] feels constrained to object to, I take it, because it belongs to a class where the proposal is to waive the statute of limitations and permit a citizen to have his day in court before the United States Employees' Compensation Commission.

The affidavits in this case were presented to the commission, and I quote the report of the commission to the chairman of the Committee on Claims, which states:

The records on this case show that Mr. Southwick did not comply with section 20 of the United States employees' compensation act, which requires that all claims must be filed within one year from the date of the injury. However, the records are clear that this claimant would have been compensated had he not neglected his rights. Therefore I feel that your committee in passing favorably upon this bill will be doing the just thing.

And I take these words, written by the United States Employees' Compensation Commission and directed to the Committee on Claims, and apply them to the Members sitting here. If we are here for the purpose of doing the just thing, then we ought to, in the words of the commission, act favorably upon this bill and permit this man to have his day in court.

Mr. HARE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SWING. I yield.

Mr. HARE. Do I understand this is a case where a man was employed in the Government service and died since the compensation act was passed?

Mr. SWING. He was injured since the passage of the compensation act.

Mr. HARE. Injured while in the service and injured in line of duty?

Mr. SWING. Yes.

Mr. HARE. He did not apply within one year following the injury?

Mr. SWING. That is right.

Mr. HARE. And the purpose of the bill is to give him the right to come in and appeal now?

Mr. SWING. And have the merits of the matters passed upon.

Mr. HARE. I want to say to the gentleman, if he will permit, that for the past several years the Congress has adopted a policy of giving these people the right to come in and present their cases, because in so many instances the man did not know that he had such a right. Of course, I understand the principle of law that ignorance is no excuse thereof, but where he did not know the right and now after the discovery of this right he comes to Congress and says that he would like to present his case on its merits, and the Congress has heretofore adopted the policy of allowing them to come in under such circumstances, I think it is unfortunate for us in this session of Congress to adopt a policy excluding cases of this kind.

Mr. SWING. I agree with the gentleman, absolutely.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SWING. Yes; certainly.

Mr. STAFFORD. I do not know whether the gentleman heard the statement I made some time ago or not.

Mr. SWING. I did; and I approve of it.

Mr. STAFFORD. There have been certain bills objected to here to-day, and I hope there will be a consistent policy so far as to-day's session is concerned, and that when we take up these bills on another calendar day we may have a different policy after the gentleman from Colorado has time to examine these bills more closely.

Mr. SWING. And we can then go back and take these bills up again. I agree with that, but just let me state what this case is to show that this man is not guilty of negligence.

He was working in the navy yard at Vallejo, Calif., as a reamer and a piece of steel flew out from the instrument at which he was working and entered his eye. He went to the Navy doctor and the Navy doctor took out a piece of steel from the eye and assumed that that was all there was. However, it developed afterwards that he had not taken all of the pieces of steel out. This was more than a year afterwards. The eye did not heal and kept on bothering him. He went to doctor after doctor for treatment, but nothing could be done about it. Then after the year of the statute of limitations had passed, finding no remedy, he had the eye taken out. After the eye was removed it was bisected and there was found within it another bit of steel which had been there from the time of the original injury. Then for the first time did his right of action or his right to apply for Government aid and relief come to his knowledge. He did apply and was rejected, solely because of the statute of limitations. If the Congress, or if the Members of the Congress believe in doing justice to ordinary citizens, frequently working men who have no property and no means and no power to protect themselves except by appealing to our sense of justice, then we ought not ourselves to stand in the way of allowing this man to have his day in court before the tribunal which we have set up for the purpose of hearing and passing upon these cases, in order that no injustice may be done an American citizen.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. EATON of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, for the reasons assigned in similar cases, I object.

WILLIAM S. STEWARD

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 2878) for the relief of William S. Steward.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. EATON of Colorado. For reasons assigned in similar cases, Mr. Speaker, I object.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Speaker, I wish to state to the gentleman that this bill and similar class of bills, reported at the last session, were objected to, and the reason given was that they did not want to set a precedent of going back behind the 1916 act. As a matter of fact, I made an investigation after those objections were made, and I have here a letter from the Secretary of War, showing that in 19 similar cases Congress has gone back to 1910 and 1911, where the Secretary of War recommended payment, and they were paid, Congress passing the authorizing measures.

That appears in the report. I do not know whether the gentleman has had an opportunity to see it or not, but it is in Document No. 21, Seventy-first Congress, first session.

Here is a letter from the Secretary of War, in which he says:

> I think there should be relief legislation in these cases for the reason given and recommended that steps be taken to have the attached drafts of bills introduced in the House and their passage expedited as much as possible. In this connection particular attention is invited to Governor Burgess's letter of April 5, 1929.

Now, Governor Burgess says in the letter referred to:

> There would be no precedent established by the enactment of these bills, as 19 relief bills have been enacted in the past in favor of canal employees injured during the construction days. A list of these cases is inclosed. Of course, it is impossible accurately to predict the number of similar cases which may arise in the future, but I am convinced that there will be very few.

Here is the list in this document of the bills introduced in Congress and passed:

> Juan Anorbe, compound fracture of the arm, with loss of function of all fingers of the right hand, total loss of the hand, $601.67.
> Charles J. Wirz, run over by car, right foot badly crushed, $1,650.

I shall not read the remaining names, but they are listed here.

In other words, all of these 19 cases appear, and they go back of 1916. I understand that the gentlemen who have been making the objections have not wanted to consider cases prior to the 1916 act—have not wanted to open up that field. There might be a reason for that if we had never done so, but we have already opened up that field. The record shows that they have all been paid compensation for injuries, many of which were less than this man received, and these cases arose from injuries received prior to the 1916 act.

In this case the man was permanently injured. The muscles in one leg are atrophied. One leg is shorter than the other. He is a helpless cripple and in destitute circumstances.

I think in view of the cases cited the gentlemen should reconsider their objections to this class of cases.

Mr. EATON of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, had the gentleman been here a week ago and made his speech, he would almost make me agree with him. I object.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes out of order.

Mr. BACHMANN. Reserving the right to object, is it with reference to the Private Calendar?

Mr. BUTLER. Yes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Speaker, I feel somewhat apologetic for taking the time to say anything at all about the Private Calendar when opportunities for considering the private claims of private citizens of this country are so rare and infrequent; but, having served on the Committee on Claims for the last two or more years, I have been a constant witness of the wrong injustice which are practiced and perpetrated upon righteous claims by this method of considering the claims of private citizens.

Under our system there is no way of presentation of a claim against the Government, except through an act of grace on the part of this Congress. I maintain that if the House of Representatives and the Congress of the United States are willing to permit claims of this kind to come here at all, we should be willing to give fair consideration to them. With all courtesy and deference to my good friend the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. EATON], I was impressed more with the injustice of the situation by the repeated objections of the gentleman here to-day and on a former occasion. I do not question the gentleman's sincerity in the matter, much less his right to object, but the gentleman is basing his objection upon the ground of his policy to oppose and prevent consideration of a certain type of bill, because that is the gentleman's policy. I say that there is something very wrong in the situation; there is something permitted to go on here which is extremely unjust and contrary to our conception of legislation, when the ideas of one man, no matter how intelligent or honest he may be, are permitted to become the policy of Congress simply because he can prevent consideration by one objection. Now, that is exactly what it means. It is unthinkable to me that one objection to one form or type of legislation should be permitted to form the policy of Congress.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BUTLER. I yield.

Mr. O'CONNOR. I think the gentleman can be consoled by the fact that this outrageous situation will not much longer endure.

Mr. BUTLER. I am glad indeed to hear that from my friend, the gentleman from New York. [Applause.] One of the reasons I am here to-day is to call attention to the fact that I was a member of a committee appointed by the Claims Committee to appear before the Rules Committee and ask for a modification and liberalization of the rules, and I trust the gentleman's words will prove to be a prophecy.

Mr. BACHMANN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BUTLER. I yield.

Mr. BACHMANN. I suggest in that connection that the gentleman read a resolution introduced by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. GREENWOOD], which is before the Rules Committee, seeking to amend the Consent Calendar and the Private Calendar, and that the gentleman will then make whatever suggestions he has to make with regard to that resolution.

Mr. BUTLER. To my fellow Republicans I want to call attention to the fact that we sat here in solemn caucus and presented a resolution amending the rules, and when I went before the Rules Committee the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. CRISP] was there also with a proposal, urging that the proposal be adopted, and the gentleman said, "There is very little difference between the rule I propose and the rule which the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. PURNELL] proposes"; which was the rule recommended by the Republican caucus.

Mr. SCHAFER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BUTLER. I yield.

Mr. SCHAFER. And is it not a fact that many Members are having their meritorious bills on the Private Calendar objected to and bills fail of consideration under the present rules, and the responsibility rests squarely upon our Democratic colleagues who voted for the previous question, which prohibited a liberalization of the rules relating to Private Calendar bills?

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman be allowed to proceed for two additional minutes, because I wish to ask him a question.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BUTLER. I yield.

Mr. BLANTON. There have been more bills passed under the present rules and unanimous-consent practice during the last three weeks than the gentleman will ever be able to have passed under the proposed change of rules in six months, because under the present rules and practice, where there can be objections which will stop the bad bills, many meritorious bills will be passed and will be off the calendar by just a mere wave of the hand of the Speaker, stating, "Without objection, the bill is ordered considered to have been engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider laid on the table." When that rule and practice is changed the gentleman will find it will take much more time to pass each separate bill than it takes now to pass numerous bills.

Mr. BUTLER. I think perhaps the gentleman is right, and I am finding no fault with any of the gentlemen here who see fit to object to a bill, but I am objecting to this Congress adopting a policy upon the objection of one Member of Congress.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman proceed for one more minute.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. BLANTON. I want to say further to my friend that if we let down the bars and take off any of the present restrictions that have been found to be good policy in the House of Representatives for the last hundred and fifty years, we will find the condition of the Treasury will become worse than that depicted this morning by our good friend the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. CRISP], the acting chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means, when he said it lacked more than a billion dollars of having anything in it.

Mr. BUTLER. This is a system of more or less recent growth.

Mr. BLANTON. We had better stop bad bills and protect the credit of this country than to let many private bills pass. There are bills on this calendar calling for nearly a million dollars.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Oregon has again expired.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for one additional minute.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. BUTLER. I wish to call to the attention of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] the fact that this system has not existed for 150 years. It is of recent growth, and we have a rule now whereby twice a month we can go into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union and consider these bills, but I am not insisting on that procedure unless we fail to obtain the modification we are seeking.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, it is true that we now have such a rule, but the gentleman would soon ascertain that if we attempted to operate under it in handling the Private Calendar not more than four or five bills could be considered and passed upon one Private Calendar day. The last time we attempted to operate under such rule we did not get to consider but three or four bills.

There should be days when we would operate under the rule the gentleman mentions and consider private bills on their merit, but the present practice of having unanimous consent for private bills does expedite their consideration. This unanimous-consent practice is more liberal than it has been at any time for 150 years.

Mr. O'CONNOR. The gentleman knows, as a matter of fact, that the Private Calendar is now being considered under no rule of the House. There is no specific rule for the consideration of this Private Calendar under unanimous consent. There is no such rule in our book of rules. The rules provide for the consideration of the Private Calendar under the general rules of the House, where a majority vote can pass any bill. All of this procedure now going on is unauthorized.

Mr. BUTLER. Absolutely.

J. P. MOYNIHAN

The Clerk called the next bill, H. R. 3691, for the relief of J. P. Moynihan.

There being no objection, the bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to J. P. Moynihan, of Chicago, Ill., the sum of $1,000. Such sum represents the amount of a bail bond deposited with the District Court of the United States for the Northern District of Illinois to secure the appearance of Joseph Krawchuk and which was forfeited.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider laid on the table.

AMOS D. CARVER

The Clerk called the next bill, H. R. 3779, for the relief of Amos D. Carver, S. E. Turner, Clifford N. Carver, Scott Blanchard, P. B. Blanchard, James B. Parse, A. N. Blanchard, and W. A. Blanchard.

Mr. BLACK and Mr. BACHMANN rose.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. BACHMANN. Mr. Speaker, I object, but I will reserve my objection if the gentleman from New York desires to speak.

Mr. BLACK. The gentleman can go on and make his statement.

Mr. BACHMANN. I think there is hardly any use in discussing this bill. The gentleman from New York can go ahead with any statement he desires to make.

Mr. BLACK. I have been trying to make a motion to substitute a Senate bill and that is all I am trying to do. If I can not be recognized for that, let it go as it is.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. BANKHEAD). The Chair will state that that motion would have been in order if consent had been given for the consideration of the House bill. Of course, there was no other course for the Chair to pursue than to ask whether there was objection to the consideration of the House bill. Does the gentleman from West Virginia object to the House bill?

Mr. BACHMANN. Mr. Speaker, I object.

HELEN PATRICIA SULLIVAN

The Clerk called the next bill, H. R. 3909, for the relief of Helen Patricia Sullivan.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, when this bill was up for consideration in the last Congress I inquired as to the present condition of this claimant. As I read the report then and as I read it now it gives me the impression that it is a padded claim. This claimant received the full amount to which she was entitled under the general claim law, namely, $500. The report shows that after a few weeks she was able to go to Montana. There is nothing in the report to show her present condition. All the report shows is that she was in the hospital for eight weeks, and she wants $5,000 in addition to the $500. I then asked for some definite information as to her present condition. If the gentleman has that information I think it would be informative to the House in considering this bill.

Mr. EVANS of California. Mr. Speaker, this claimant was injured by being run into by a mail delivery truck on the streets of the city of Los Angeles. She was a visitor there. She resides somewhere in the State of Montana. She resided there then and she resides there now.

The facts in this case, as disclosed by the affidavits made a part of the report, show that she received a fractured hip and a fractured skull; that she was confined to the hospital, to her room and bed for quite a while. I think instead of being several weeks it was several months.

Mr. STAFFORD. The affidavits of the doctor in this case show that she suffered pain for 8 or 12 weeks, and that is all.

Mr. EVANS of California. That is more than two or three months.

Mr. STAFFORD. It is not three months, but it may be more than two months.

Mr. EVANS of California. The report of the Postmaster General states as follows, eliminating the introductory:

Responsibility for this accident rests with the Government. The actual expenditures of the claimant by reason of the injuries sustained in this accident are in excess of $500. It is accordingly recommended that she be allowed the sum of $500, the full amount claimed.

Under the law the Post Office Department could not pay her more than $500. That was all she could claim there. But that by no means signifies that that was the full amount of her claim. It may be that the sum of $5,000 would be a little excessive; I do not know, but I do not believe it would be. Certainly, however, this woman is entitled to more than $500, because the attending physician showed that she paid out more than $500 in hospital bills, and so on.

Mr. STAFFORD. Has the gentleman any information at all as to what her present condition is?

Mr. EVANS of California. I understand she has substantially recovered; not entirely, but is now in fairly good condition.

Mr. STAFFORD. And the record shows that she worked for two weeks during the Christmas holidays following the accident.

Mr. EVANS of Montana. The woman was injured in March, and she was on crutches until July, so that she could not have worked during the Christmas holidays.

Mr. STAFFORD. The report shows that she worked during the Christmas holidays for two weeks.

Mr. EVANS of Montana. That was the year afterwards.

Mr. STAFFORD. And you are asking Uncle Sam to be the happy Santa Claus and give this woman $5,000 when, as the gentleman from California states, she has substantially recovered. I shall object unless the amount is substantially reduced.

I do not want to interpose captious objections. If the gentleman has any amount to suggest as an amendment——

Mr. EVANS of California. Will the gentleman suggest an amount?

Mr. STAFFORD. No; but if the amount suggested is in any way fair to the Government I shall not interpose any objection.

Mr. EVANS of California. I may say in response to the gentleman's objection that I would be willing to amend the bill by inserting $2,500.

Mr. STAFFORD. No; she has already received $500.

Mr. EVANS of California. Then I shall make it $2,000 in order to get some compensation for this woman before it is too late.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, with that assurance, I have no objection.

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay to Helen Patricia Sullivan, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $5,000 in full settlement of damages sustained April 12, 1929, at Los Angeles, Calif., when she was struck by an automobile operated under the jurisdiction of the Post Office Department: Provided, That no part of the amount appropriated in this act in excess of 10 per cent thereof shall be paid or delivered to or received by any agent or agents, attorney or attorneys, on account of services rendered in connection with said claim. It shall be unlawful for any agent or agents, attorney or attorneys, to exact, collect, withhold, or receive any sum of the amount appropriated in this act in excess of 10 per cent thereof on account of services rendered in connection with said claim, any contract to the contrary notwithstanding. Any person violating the provisions of this act shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and upon conviction thereof shall be fined in any sum not exceeding $1,000.

Mr. EVANS of California. Mr. Speaker, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. EVANS of California: Page 1, line 6, strike out "$5,000" and insert in lieu thereof "$2,000."

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. Speaker, I have been listening for nearly 10 years to tirades against this particular method of considering the Private Calendar, to wit, only bills unobjected to. During all that time, with one exception, private bills have been considered under only unanimous consent. On one day only were they considered under the general rules of the House. If the Private Calendar is considered under unanimous consent only—the present method, whereby one individual "self-appointed," as I have often said, who can obstruct the entire work of the committee reporting the bill and substitute his individual judgment, advised or ill-advised, for the judgment of that committee—it is solely the fault of the House.

On any Friday that a majority of the membership of this House desires to consider the Private Calendar under the general rules of the House, it is entitled to do so. If the rule for the consideration of the Private Calendar is amended as proposed, it will make the consideration of private bills less liberal, as far as the majority membership of the House is concerned, than under the present rule. If the present rule be not amended—I, for one, should like to see the question of consideration tested out—I should like to see the chairman of the Committee on Claims, for instance, rise on a Friday and move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of bills on the Private Calendar. That, I believe, is a privileged motion under the rule.

Subdivision 6 of Rule XXIV provides—

> On Friday of each week, after disposal of such business on the Speaker's table as requires reference only, it shall be in order to entertain a motion for the House to resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House to consider business on the Private Calendar in the following order: On the second and fourth Fridays of each month preference shall be given to the consideration of private pension claims and bills removing political disabilities and bills removing the charge of desertion. On every Friday except the second and fourth Fridays the House shall give preference to the consideration of bills reported from the Committee on Claims and the Committee on War Claims, alternating between the two committees.

Now, it just happens that on every occasion, except one, in the past 25 years, I believe—because this subdivision 6 of Rule XXIV was adopted in the Sixty-second Congress—the Private Calendar has been considered under unanimous consent and as to only those bills unobjected to. That method has been taken for granted as the only method of the consideration of private bills. I am sure that most of the membership of the House has been led into the belief that the Private Calendar must be considered under unanimous consent, and that only bills unobjected to can be considered. That, however, is not the rule of this House.

Mr. BLAND. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. O'CONNOR. Yes.

Mr. BLAND. It is my recollection in about 14 years of service that on one occasion the rule was invoked, and I think four claims were considered on that day.

Mr. O'CONNOR. That, I believe, is true. But, as I say, on any Friday that the House wants to consider the bills on the Private Calendar under the general rules of the House, it can be done. Of course, it has been held under the rulings of the Chair that an appropriation bill or a revenue bill has precedence over the Private Calendar on Fridays. (Speaker Clark, March 6, 1914; that a special order of business takes precedence over the Private Calendar. House Precedents, Vol. IV, 3201, 3202, 3282.)

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. O'CONNOR. For a question.

Mr. BLANTON. I am sure the distinguished gentleman from New York——

Mr. O'CONNOR. I do not yield any further, because the gentleman does not start out as though he is going to ask a question. Questions usually start with an interrogatory expression such as "will" or "does" or "is" or some anticipatory word or phrase like that. Please leave off the speechifying preface.

Mr. BLANTON. I will leave off all preface. He knows that we have passed more bills to-day under the present unanimous-consent arrangement than we could pass in an entire session of the Congress if we were operating under the rule mentioned.

Mr. O'CONNOR. If the gentleman thinks that is an answer and sufficient to him, it is certainly not sufficient to me. Nor do I believe it is sufficient to the majority of the membership of this House. If you, sir, arbitrarily, on the sole judgment of yourself, object to one meritorious bill, you do more harm than if we did not consider the Private Calendar at all. [Applause.]

During the last session of Congress, on at least two occasions when objections were being made, arbitrarily, as I thought—and I had no bills on those calendars, nor was I interested in any bills on the calendar—but when I saw that consideration of the calendar was being conducted in the usual outrageous manner, I thereupon exercised one of my highest prerogatives and made the point of order there was no quorum present. That ended the consideration of the Private Calendar for that day. I felt justified in doing what I did, because I have always considered the consideration of the Private Calendar under unanimous consent a legislative farce.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for three additional minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. O'CONNOR. To repeat, the only matters that could interfere with consideration of the Private Calendar on any Friday under the general rules of the House are matters of legislative preference and of great preference. We need not dispense with consideration of the Private Calendar on every Friday for the reason that there are seldom preferential matter available for consideration.

Under the rule proposed, which I hope will be brought in for consideration by the House, five objections will be required; and if made, the bill goes to a "deferred list." Mr. GREENWOOD, of Indiana, has introduced House Resolution 127, proposing amendments to the rules for consideration of the Consent Calendar and the Private Calendar.

As to the consideration of the Private Calendar, Mr. GREENWOOD proposes the following rule:

> That clause 6 of Rule XXIV be amended to read as follows:
> "On Saturday of each week, after the disposal of such business on the Speaker's table as requires reference only, it shall be in order to move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House to consider business on the Private Calendar. In the Committee of the Whole House the Chairman shall direct the Clerk to call the bills in numerical order that have been upon the Private Calendar for three legislative days. When the Clerk shall have read the bill the same shall be considered, unless objection or reservation of objection is made to immediate consideration. Should objection or reservation of objection be made, there shall be 10 minutes general debate, to be divided, 5 minutes controlled by the Member offering the objection or reservation and 5 minutes controlled by the chairman of the committee reporting the bill, or in his absence by any Member supporting the bill. If, after such debate, three objections are not forthcoming, the bill shall be considered under the 5-minute rule. After the debate hereinbefore referred to, or when the bill is first called, if objection is made by three Members to the consideration of the bill, then the same shall be passed over and carried to a list designated as 'Deferred.' It shall be in order for the bills on the deferred list to have the first call in their numerical order when the Private Calendar is called on the last Saturday of each month. At this time the bills on the deferred list shall be considered under the general rules of the Committee of the Whole House, with 10 minutes general debate, to be divided equally, with 5 minutes controlled by the chairman of the committee reporting the bill or other person supporting the bill and 5 minutes controlled by any person objecting or opposing the bill. After the debate the bill shall be read for amendment under the 5-minute rule. If, however, after such consideration the Committee of the Whole House acts on the bill adversely, it shall be laid aside until the committee arises, whereupon it shall be reported back to the House with the adverse recommendation. Any bill under this rule reported back to the House with an adverse recommendation shall automatically be recommitted to the standing committee reporting it, and said bill shall not again be reported during the same Congress."

I have supported certain amendments to that proposal, to wit, that the general debate on bills considered on the "deferred list" be confined to a total of 20 minutes. That meets the objection of the gentleman from Texas. I further provide that a bill reported back to the House with an adverse recommendation may be considered again during another session of the same Congress.

Under the proper rule the "deferred list" will be brought up on the last Friday of each month and will be considered under the general rules of the House.

What the gentleman from Texas had in mind when he said it would take so much time to consider private bills under the general rules of the House, was the provision in the rule for unlimited debate under the 5-minute rule, when a bill on the deferred calendar was called up under the rules of the House. My proposed amendment corrects this.

Now, I merely call the attention of the House to the fact that in the conduct of all legislative matters, the majority of the House has absolute control. No minority of even 216 Members can control the action of this House. If the membership is dissatisfied at any time with the procedure in the House—and I believe 90 per cent of the men and women are dissatisfied with the present methods of considering the Private Calendar—a majority can change the procedure as and when it sees fit.

Mr. PATTERSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. PATTERSON. Mr. Speaker and Members of the House, I recognize that there should be some improvement in the consideration of the Private Calendar, but, on the other hand, I think most of us agree with the gentleman from Texas that probably we are now proceeding with the most rapid method in the consideration of this calendar. I do not believe any gentleman here wishes to put his judgment against the judgment of the House.

But I rose principally to reply to something said by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. LOZIER] a few days ago, when we were considering a bill similar to the bill I have objected to, offered by my colleague, the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. COCHRAN]. Mr. LOZIER said, in effect, on page 3461 of CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of Friday, February 5, 1932:

> That bill is not predicated on a request that the statute of limitations be waived in a case where the claimant has neglected to file his claim within the statutory period. That bill is based on the contention that the taxpayer filed his claim before the statute of limitations had run. The real question in the instant case is whether or not the taxpayer complied with his statutory duty and made his claim to the Treasury Department within the period in which such claim could be lawfully tendered.

That was on a bill sponsored by the gentleman from Idaho [Mr. FRENCH]. He introduced a bill to remove the statute of limitations where the claimant had intrusted his claim to a lawyer, and the lawyer presumably sent the claim in, but by some neglect of the mail or the Treasury Department the claim was not allowed, presumably because they got the papers misplaced or did not receive them.

I wanted to point out a while ago to my colleague the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. COCHRAN], that there was more than $4,000,000,000 liability if the statute of limitations were removed, that the claims on the Treasury would amount to more than $4,000,000,000 to be paid back. Of course, I do not take the position that a just claim should be disallowed. In fact, I feel that every honest obligation, public or private, should be met, but in matters like these responsibility for the discrepancies should and must rest somewhere. Either with those who handled them, the Post Office Department, or the Treasury officials, and they should be held to that responsibility; and before the Congress begins to pass favorably on those claims they should give them very careful consideration and evolve a general policy, rather than considering just a few of the thousands which might be presented.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PATTERSON. I yield.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. The gentleman could go back a very little farther in his research and find that in the last week of the Seventy-first Congress, while the gentleman was on the floor, and the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD] was on the floor, the House passed a bill to refund money to a hunting and fishing club in Maryland, on all fours with my bill objected to in the last Congress and objected to to-day. I do not care if there are $50,000,000 of such claims against the Government, if the Government has no right to the money, it should be refunded to the taxpayers. If some one paid my good friend a bill twice, I know he is honorable and would refund the overpayment. Why should the Government not do as my friend would do, as any honorable man or corporation would do?

Mr. PATTERSON. I thank the gentleman for his kind reference to my own honesty and will say in reply that I wish to deserve his confidence, and also agree with him that this Government should discharge its responsibility; but, as I say, a policy in dealing with these claims should be formed by the Congress after careful consideration and responsibility for failure placed; if it is with the Treasury or Post Office or individual, let them answer, and, of course if it is the Congress, let Congress answer, for if we should open the door without a policy, there is no telling where we should end, for common fairness would entitle all if one.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Bring them out; I have no objection. Consider them on their merits and there should be no complaint.

Mr. PATTERSON. Well, the gentleman sees the condition that the Treasury is in to-day, and I think we should be careful in opening the door by special legislation; but I am willing to give these and all other claims due consideration and try to pass a general law applying to them after careful consideration. I believe it is needless for me to say to my good colleague, the efficient and able Representative from Missouri [Mr. COCHRAN], that I do not wish to object to any meritorious claim. All I wish to do is to do as he is trying to do—my duty by my constituents and the country. And in closing, I will say that I think if claims of this nature are to be considered at all they should be considered more at length than they are considered under the rules of the Private Calendar.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for three minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Speaker, while I would like to see the new rule adopted, I must say that in the two calendar days which we have had in the House this session, we have made fairly substantial progress, and I want to thank the gentlemen who are generally understood to be conscientious objectors on this calendar for the great amount of help they have rendered this committee, both on last calendar day and to-day. The objections offered to-day were generally accompanied by suggestions for a reforming of a bill, or workable amendments and things like that, which were quite helpful. We have passed quite a few bills to-day.

I do think that when Members take advantage of the unanimous-consent procedure to object to a line of bills one after another because they do not like the policy involved, they are probably taking too much on themselves. I think it would be better if they would state their own position and then let the House decide whether the House cares to go along with such bills. But I do want to thank the gentlemen who are charged with watching this calendar. The Committee on Claims has a great deal of work on its hands, and we can not always do everything right. It is a great help to have objections made in good faith, as they came to-day.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the gentleman from California.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

B. K. STILES & CO.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 3987) for the relief of R. K. Stiles & Co.

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to R. K. Stiles & Co., of Kansas City, Kans., the sum of $569.34, representing the sum expended by said R. K. Stiles & Co. in the reconstruction of a retaining wall between its property in the city of Kansas City, Kans., and the Wyandotte Indian Cemetery at Kansas City, Kans., which collapsed on June 1, 1929, and repairing damage to buildings on its property as the result of such collapse.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

ARTHUR A. BURN, SR., AND J. K. RYLAND

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 3994) for the relief of Arthur A. Burn, sr., and J. K. Ryland.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. EATON of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, for the reasons heretofore assigned to a like bill, I object.

Mr. HARE. Will the gentleman reserve his objection?

Mr. EATON of Colorado. I reserve the objection.

Mr. HARE. I do not know that this comes within the class of bills that has been heretofore objected to.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman yield in that particular?

Mr. HARE. I yield.

Mr. STAFFORD. Is it not a fact that both of these claimants had their day in court before the compensation commission, and did not avail themselves of that privilege?

Mr. HARE. No.

Mr. STAFFORD. Oh, one of them did.

Mr. HARE. One of them did.

Mr. STAFFORD. And the other could have if he can prove he is dependent.

Mr. HARE. But suppose he can not prove he is a dependent?

Mr. STAFFORD. Then he must look to the person at fault, that is, the officer, and the two boys who went into a skiff which was overloaded.

Mr. HARE. I would like the gentleman to read the report of the director of the Department of Commerce.

Mr. STAFFORD. I assure the gentleman I have read the report very carefully.

Mr. HARE. The director says that there were two young men, about 18 years of age, who were employed by the Coast and Geodetic Survey. They were at work off the coast of Florida. They were under the supervision of an experienced seaman. They had a mere skiff that they used to go from the main boat to the mainland. As they came back to get aboard the main boat in the afternoon they got into a skiff that is admitted was not seaworthy.

The Department of Commerce admits that the men in charge erred in using this skiff for the purpose of transporting these young men to the boat. There was no excuse for them to get into the deep water in the first place. These two young men were in the discharge of their duties. They were in line of duty, and this little skiff overturned and they were drowned. Here were two men in charge of the skiff, experienced seamen, who deserted and went to the mainland to save their own lives and left these two youths to look out for themselves, and they drowned. The Department of Commerce recommends that their heirs or their parents be paid for the loss of the lives of the two young men. This bill passed the House last year without objection and went to the Senate and was left on the calendar. This is not a bill within the classes of bills objected to here today. It is separate and is distinct in character and the liability is definite and certain. It stands upon its own merits, and it is not in any way connected with any other class of bills.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HARE. I yield.

Mr. STAFFORD. The Government has established a policy that persons who suffer injury while in the service shall receive compensation under the compensation act of 1916. One of the parents of these unfortunate boys has availed himself of that compensation act.

Mr. HARE. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. And now the gentleman is seeking to single out for special favoritism and consideration a case to go beyond the general law.

Mr. HARE. No. Permit me to explain. In order for the parent in this case to receive compensation under the compensation act he must show conclusively that his income does not exceed, say, $100 per month. That is, the parent must be dependent. This boy's father at the time was in the employ of the Government and was drawing $150 a month. Therefore he could not qualify under the compensation act, and to-day the father has become disabled and now out of employment, and under the policy adopted by the gentleman here to-day he would be estopped from filing an application to-day, because more than one year has expired since the boy lost his life.

I say in all fairness that since the Director of the Coast and Geodetic Survey and the Secretary of Commerce have said the claimants should be paid, this bill should be considered and passed. For the benefit of the gentleman and for the benefit of the House I want to read a part of the report, and I want to say that I am not accustomed to stand here and plead for cases without merit.

This accident was the result of poor judgment in attempting to put out into deep water in a craft never intended for that purpose. However, the error was that of the officer in charge, and it appears that Ryland and Burn were obeying the orders of their superior officer, and, therefore, can not be held responsible for the accident. They lost their lives while in the performance of official business. If, in the judgment of the Congress, this constitutes a reasonable basis for the relief of the heirs of these two men, over and above that already received through the Employees' Compensation Commission, then, in my opinion, this bill should receive favorable consideration.

That is the statement of the Director of the Coast and Geodetic Survey, and it is recommended by the Secretary of Commerce after having gone into the facts in detail. Remember, the two young men were acting in obedience to orders, and it was the error of judgment on the part of those in charge that caused them to lose their lives. As a consequence, the Government is liable, and the bill carries only $5,000. We asked for $15,000, but the committee said $5,000, which we have agreed to accept.

If this bill is not passed, Mr. Burn will not have an opportunity to go to the Employees' Compensation Commission, under the policy adopted to-day and heretofore, because more than one year has expired, and he could not do it under any circumstances. This young man, the only son he had and who would now have been able to support him in his declining years, lost his life in the discharge of his duty and in the discharge of official business and on account of the negligence of the representatives of the Government. To my mind there has never been a clearer or more meritorious case, both legally and equitably, presented to this Congress than the one we have before us.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. STAFFORD and Mr. EATON of Colorado objected.

RAYMOND D. WOODS

The Clerk called the next bill, H. R. 4160, for the relief of Raymond D. Woods.

There being no objection, the bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to Raymond D. Woods, a first lieutenant in the Officers' Reserve Corps of the United States Army, the sum of $480.47 for pay and allowances for the period from December 18, 1927, until February 21, 1928, inclusive, while he was hospitalized at Fort Sam Houston, Tex., for an injury incurred while on active duty.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider laid on the table.

R. W. SELVIDGE

The Clerk called the next bill, H. R. 4287, for the relief of R. W. Selvidge.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I ask that this bill be passed over without prejudice.

The SPEAKER. That is equivalent to an objection. The gentleman from Wisconsin objects.

PASQUALE MIRABELLI

The Clerk called the next bill, H. R. 4453, for the relief of Pasquale Mirabelli.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. BACHMANN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to ask whether there is any objection to an amendment of this bill which will state the facts other than the way they are stated in the bill at the present time? If not, I shall not object.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay to Pasquale Mirabelli, of Rochester, N. Y., the sum of $1,000, representing the amount of cash bond which he deposited in behalf of his son, Vincenzo Mirabelli, against whom deportation proceedings had been instituted, and which was erroneously collected and covered into the United States Treasury.

Mr. BACHMANN. Mr. Speaker, I offer an amendment.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from West Virginia offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. BACHMANN: Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert the following:

"That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay to Pasquale Mirabelli, of Rochester, N. Y., the sum of $1,000 representing the amount of cash bond which he deposited in behalf of his son, Vincenzo Mirabelli, against whom deportation proceedings had been instituted, and which bond was declared forfeited prior to the time the alien was apprehended and deported."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BACHMANN. Mr. Speaker, I offer another amendment.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from West Virginia offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. BACHMANN: At the end of the bill add the following:

"Provided, That no part of the amount appropriated in this act in excess of 10 per cent thereof shall be paid or delivered to or received by any agent or agents, attorney or attorneys, on account of services rendered in connection with said claim. It shall be unlawful for any agent or agents, attorney or attorneys, to exact, collect, withhold, or receive any sum of the amount appropriated in this act in excess of 10 per cent thereof on account of services rendered in connection with said claim, any contract to the contrary notwithstanding. Any person violating the provisions of this act shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and upon conviction thereof shall be fined in any sum not exceeding $1,000."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider laid on the table.

MILDRED B. CRAWFORD

The Clerk called the next bill, H. R. 996, for the relief of Mildred B. Crawford.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. BACHMANN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to ask how the amount was arrived at which is sought to be recovered?

Mr. TUCKER. Mr. Speaker, the amount asked for was $5,000, and we finally agreed to accept $2,500. This lady has been in bed for the last six months, with doctors from Philadelphia and doctors at home, and she has suffered tortures. I hope the gentleman will not object to this bill in any way.

Mr. BACHMANN. Does the gentleman have personal knowledge of the case and personal acquaintance with the claimant?

Mr. TUCKER. I certainly have.

Mr. BACHMANN. In view of the statement of the gentleman from Virginia, Mr. Speaker, I withdraw my reservation of objection.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. SCHAFER. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to express my appreciation of the liberality shown by the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. BACHMANN] in connection with this meritorious bill, which was considered by the subcommittee of which I was chairman and reported by the Claims Committee. I certainly hope that in the future, when my bill (H. R. 941, Calendar No. 124) providing $2,500 for the loss of three fingers and a thumb of a child 8 years of age comes up again that the gentleman from West Virginia will not object to it as he did to-day. In the future when he practices law and he has a client come to him who has lost three fingers and a thumb and asks him to bring a suit for $10,000, I hope that the gentleman will not tell his client to bring a suit for only $1,000.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to Mildred B. Crawford the sum of $5,000 in full compensation for injuries which she sustained December 4, 1924, by the revolving door (which had been condemned) at the front entrance of the post office at Staunton, Va.:

With the following committee amendments:

Page 1, line 6, strike out "$5,000" and insert "$2,500."

Page 1, line 6, after the word "full," strike out the word "compensation" and insert the words "settlement of all claims against the Government of the United States."

Page 1, line 10, after the word "Virginia" insert:

"Provided, That no part of the amount appropriated in this act in excess of 10 per cent thereof shall be paid or delivered to or received by any agent or agents, attorney or attorneys, on account of services rendered in connection with said claim. It shall be unlawful for any agent or agents, attorney or attorneys, to exact, collect, withhold, or receive any sum of the amount appropriated in this act in excess of 10 per cent thereof on account of services rendered in connection with said claim, any contract to the contrary notwithstanding. Any person violating the provisions of this act shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and upon conviction thereof shall be fined in any sum not exceeding $1,000."

The committee amendments were agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider laid on the table.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order there is not a quorum present.

The SPEAKER. Will the gentleman withhold that a moment?

Mr. STAFFORD. I withhold it, Mr. Speaker.

RESIGNATION FROM COMMITTEES

The SPEAKER. The Chair lays before the House the following resignation.

The Clerk read as follows:

CONGRESS OF THE UNITED STATES,
February 11, 1932.

SIR: I hereby resign as a member of the following-named standing committees: Coinage, Weights, and Measures; Public Lands; Territories; Education; Patents; and War Claims.

Respectfully submitted.

PAUL JOHN KVALE, M. C.

Hon. JOHN GARNER,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the resignation will be accepted.

There was no objection.

MANUFACTURE OF MALT BEVERAGES

Mr. WELCH of California. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for three minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California?

There was no objection.

Mr. WELCH of California. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. CRISP] delivered a most interesting address to-day. He told the people of the country that it would be necessary in order to balance the Budget to raise $1,200,000,000 additional in taxes. He appealed to us to stand by the committee in the great task that confronts it.

I rise here to-day to say that I am presenting to the House a petition signed by over 4,000 farmers of California, owners of over 1,400,000 acres of land, urging the Congress to provide for the manufacture of malt beverages of a higher alcoholic content than is now permitted, so that their surplus grain can be used in its manufacture. I say to the gentleman from Georgia here is where his committee can secure an annual sum of $400,000,000 in taxes, and the only industry that will be crippled will be the bootlegging industry. [Applause.] Such a procedure would place several hundred thousand men to work, and would absorb 128,000,000 bushels of the grain now in elevators. [Applause.] I sincerely hope that the Ways and Means Committee will give consideration to my suggestion. [Applause.]

I now submit the petition. [Applause.]

TAX COLLECTIONS AND FEDERAL-AID PAYMENTS

Mr. BACON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for one-half minute out of order.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. BACON. Mr. Speaker, the Treasury Department has very recently compiled some very interesting figures on Federal tax collections and Federal-aid payments. Several Members have asked me for a copy of this table. I have only one, and I therefore ask unanimous consent to insert it in the RECORD at this point.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

ABRAHAM LINCOLN—ANNIVERSARY OF HIS BIRTH

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, in this hour of world-wide unrest Lincoln speaks to us out of a dim but unforgettable past. Instinctively we turn to him as a rugged pillar of strength arising out of another period of adversity not unlike that which we now experience. In the voluminous records of his achievements we may find still glowing the vision, the resourcefulness, and the courage that lighted his path to immortality.

It is not my purpose to eulogize Lincoln to-day. We have more need of his fortitude than he has need of our praise. No encomium can augment his undying fame, and words can neither add to nor detract from the deep-seated love and admiration which he inspires within the American people. If Lincoln were among us, he would give no heed to the eloquence that is being broadcasted from ocean to ocean in commemoration of his birth. Rather he would suggest that we dedicate ourselves "to the great task remaining before us."

Lincoln is known as the man of adversity. Throughout his life he was followed by grief and disappointment. But despair was alien to his nature. Whether destiny led to his side a mother of fallen soldiers, or inflicted upon his apprehensive mind the torture of the battle's furnace mouth, he held fast to confidence in the triumph of right, and his purpose never swerved. God must have planted in his heart an abiding courage from which a nation, hungry for faith in the future, might draw strength in the days of its peril.

One can not read American history without being conscious of a similarity between the dark days before the end of the Civil War and the present eclipse. What was expected to be a short and decisive combat extended into four years of internecine war, during which time there were grave misgivings as to the outcome. In our own day what appeared to be a momentary check upon our economic progress has proved to be a critical derangement throughout the business and industrial world. Many hearts sickened before the cannon's mouth; many sicken now before the twin dilemma of overproduction and unemployment, accompanied by want and mental anguish. But Lincoln sustained the Nation through its greatest political crisis by his own indomitable courage, and I have every confidence that the same spirit will actuate the American people in the present exigency.

To-day we are able to see that Lincoln pursued one straightforward and determined course from beginning to end. From a perspective of nearly 70 years we recognize that he was right and that he alone seems to have been competent to preserve the Union. But in the thick of the fight the wisdom of his policy was not so readily discernible. Tempestuous friends assailed him; enemies plotted against him; subordinates mistook his kindness and humility for weakness and sought to dominate over him, and thousands of spineless citizens urged him to sacrifice the Union to avoid bloodshed. But Lincoln projected his faith and courage through one catastrophe after another until at last victory could no longer elude him.

President Lincoln was charged with responsibility for every disaster that vexed the Nation. His enemies magnified every calamity and denounced him with such craven abuse that one's blood boils to read it. Knowing that the people were discouraged and sick of war, unscrupulous politicians sought, by advocating dishonorable peace, to defeat the President who had insisted on saving the Union at any cost. Everything that misrepresentation, malignity, personal ill will, and partisan zeal could ascribe to Lincoln was venomously used against him.

In an effort to split the Republican Party and thus defeat Lincoln a group of insurgents held a separate convention at Cleveland and nominated General Frémont for the Presidency. Secret plots to withdraw from Lincoln the support of his party were exposed and efforts were made to draft members of his Cabinet to run against him. The antiadministration factions had been encouraged by several victories in the congressional elections two years before. Seeking to consolidate that advantage, they appealed to the electorate on the basis of peace through compromise. Lincoln was stigmatized a traitor and charged with drenching the Nation in blood. No administration was ever more bitterly, violently, or persistently denounced in a political campaign.

We ought never to forget how Lincoln met this crisis. Did he appeal for votes on an evasive and hollow promise of peace and economy? No! The platform on which he stood demanded more vigorous taxation to finance the war. In spite of the ominous scroll of the dead and disabled in this fratricidal carnage, which was causing unrest throughout the country, Lincoln called for 500,000 fresh volunteers within six weeks of his nomination for a second term. When the integrity of the American Union was at stake no thought of his own interest could induce Lincoln to promise an early peace. Instead he declared that there would be no end to the war until the national power was restored over the entire national domain.

Lincoln was offered a profusion of panaceas. Schemes for ending the war were almost as numerous as those which are now pressed upon the President for dealing with the depression. But Lincoln courageously discarded every plan that did not contribute to his central purpose—the preservation of the Union. Throughout this greatest American crisis he stood like a rock against the flood. Lincoln seems to have been the only leader who saw clearly the momentous issues involved and who had a program adequate to meet them. With humble disregard of calumny and slander, he held steadfastly to the right, as God gave him to see the right. To-day his name is reverenced wherever civilization has reached, while the shallow minds who manufactured anathema against him have long since passed into the void of oblivion.

When the execrations against Lincoln were loudest, he asked each member of his Cabinet to sign a document without seeing its contents. After the election was over they learned that he had considered his defeat "exceedingly probable" and had pledged them to cooperate with the President elect in saving the Union between election day and the inauguration. No threat of defeat, disgrace, or even death could mitigate his ardor for the preservation of America as a unified and enduring Nation.

Mr. President, the point I wish to emphasize is that the immortal Lincoln, in his own day, was represented as an incompetent and docile President, blundering through a difficult situation. Only when his work was accomplished and death snatched victory from his hands did the world realize that one of the most sublime characters of all history had played his part and passed on. In the passions of war, as in the panic of depression, we too frequently lose sight of true leadership, until the clouds roll away and our vision is clarified.

The buoyant courage and unwavering determination of Lincoln put to shame those Americans who have surrendered to skepticism and despair because of the economic storm which is now sweeping over the world. Loyal citizens can best observe the anniversary of his birth by reviving the indomitable spirit that actuated him to declare:

> We shall not fail—if we stand firm, we shall not fail. Wise counsel may accelerate or mistakes delay it, but, sooner or later, the victory is sure to come.

I close with his simple, yet powerful, message of faith, confidence, and forbearance, couched in these words from his first inaugural address:

> Intelligence, patriotism, Christianity, and a firm reliance on Him who has never yet forsaken this favored land are still competent to adjust in the best way all our present difficulty.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, three years ago to-day, at the Lincoln Memorial here in Washington, a brief but very brilliant address was delivered by the junior Senator from California [Mr. SHORTRIDGE]. I have the manuscript in my hand, and I ask unanimous consent to have it inserted in the RECORD.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The address is as follows:

ABRAHAM LINCOLN

My countrymen, the Republic "conceived in liberty and dedicated to the proposition that all men are created equal," in the throes of dissolution; the Union of Washington and Jackson, framed by the wisdom and sanctified by the blood of brothers, about to be rent asunder; the "government of the people, by the people, and for the people," in mortal danger of perishing from the earth—in that dark hour of estrangement, doubt, and fear the great captain of our country's salvation came.

He came, and thenceforth all was clear. Simple in speech, plain in manner, straightforward in action; tender as a child, fearless as a hero, humble and lowly, he came to speak and to act. Born of southern parents and reared in the broad prairies of the West, whose very winds sang liberty, he realized the curse of bondage and the blessing of freedom. From the unfelled forest, from the log cabin and the country store, from humble forum and obscure dwelling, from out the ranks of the people the great captain came. He came, and statesmen paused and wondered; he spoke, and a Nation hearkened to his counsel.

Devoted to truth and the right, opposed to falsehood and the wrong; scorning the tricks and subterfuges of the self-seeking and abhorring the mean and base; loving his country with a devotion that made him forgetful of all save the preservation of the Union, the incomparable leader rose. In judicial tribunal and hall of state, in capital and village, in stately mansion and log hut bewildered men listened to his words and saw, as they had never seen before, the darkness, the light, and the path; the wrong, the right, and the remedy.

Who was this man that came unheralded out of the West? Who was this man that rose above great statesmen of his day—who was as earnest as Phillips, as gifted as Baker, more profound than Seward, more wise than Chase, more logical than Douglas, more eloquent than Everett?

Who was this man that combined in one soul the simplicity of a child, the wisdom of a sage, and the foresight of a prophet?

Wheresoever among men there is a love for disinterested patriotism and sublime attachment to duty; wheresoever liberty is worshiped and loyalty exalted, his name, his life, his deeds are known. To-day his image is in all hearts, his name is on all lips. That humble, loving, forgiving, sublime man was the rail-splitter of Illinois—sainted and immortal Abraham Lincoln—Abraham Lincoln, child of poverty, champion of freedom, savior of the Union.

Rejoice and give thanks to God. The dark hour of brotherly estrangement is gone forever. The Constitution of Washington and Jackson remains. The Union, strong and great, endures. The "government of the people, by the people, and for the people" did not perish. The sons of America march all one way.

And for all these blessings we stand here to-day in this sacred place, beneath the one and only banner of the loyal heart, to pay the tribute of our veneration and gratitude and love to Abraham Lincoln.

Mr. DILL. Mr. President, in keeping with the remarks about Abraham Lincoln, I desire to read a very short poem entitled "But Slavery Lingers," by George Sanford Holmes, printed in to-day's Washington Daily News:

BUT SLAVERY LINGERS

By George Sanford Holmes

Would you were living now, old Honest Abe,
To carry on the mission you began;
You freed the bonded black, the unborn babe,
But slavery lingers still to torture man.

Ere you were martyred in an hour of need
You warned of great monopolies afar,
Of fetters forged by corporate gold and greed
More dangerous, you said, than civil war.

You drove slave drivers from the brakes of cane
And cotton fields, but now, dread aftermath,
The money changers desecrate your fane
With none to whip them out in righteous wrath.

If you were here you would emancipate
Your party from all special privilege
And striking at new shackles, liberate
Your land from economic peonage.

I ask unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD also at this point an editorial from the Daily News of this date entitled "Lincoln's Wisdom."

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

LINCOLN'S WISDOM

Instead of repeating the familiar eulogies let us on this his birthday invoke the wisdom of Abraham Lincoln. How timely to-day are these phrases uttered 70 years ago:

"At what point then is the approach of danger? I answer, if it ever reach us it must spring up amongst us; it can not come from abroad. If destruction be our lot we ourselves must be its author and finisher. As a nation of freemen we must live through all time, or die by suicide."

"The only way to keep men from agitating grievances is to relieve the grievances. The seed of revolution is repression."

"This country, with its institutions, belongs to the people who inhabit it. Whenever they shall grow weary of the existing Government they can exercise their constitutional right of amending it or their revolutionary rights to dismember or overthrow it."

"Labor is prior to and independent of capital. Capital is only the fruit of labor, and should never have existed if labor had not first existed. Labor is the superior of capital and deserves much higher consideration."

"Our republican robe is soiled and trailed in the dust. Let us repurify it."

"Fondly do we hope—fervently do we pray—that this mighty scourge of war may speedily pass away."

"Let us have faith that right makes might, and in that faith let us to the end dare to do our duty as we understand it."

"With malice toward none; with charity for all; with firmness in the right as God gives us to see the right, let us strive to finish the work we are in * * *."

"* * * That this Nation, under God, shall have a new birth of freedom; and that government of the people, by the people, for the people, shall not perish from the earth."

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a telegram from the Wisconsin State Chamber of Commerce, signed by John L. Barchard, its president, which was ordered to lie on the table and to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[Telegram]

MILWAUKEE, WIS., February 11, 1932.

Hon. CHARLES CURTIS,
Vice President, care United States Senate,
Washington, D. C.:

Business conditions in Wisconsin are above the average. Wisconsin can take care of its own relief of the unemployed. Speaking for the business interests of Wisconsin, as represented in the membership of its 62 affiliated organizations with about 20,000 individual business men, we wish to state that there is a greater political objective than a relief objective in the request of the Wisconsin Legislature for Federal relief for Wisconsin. We object to have charity made the football of politics. The Wisconsin Legislature has already appropriated millions of dollars. The various community chests have been largely oversubscribed. We believe that unemployment relief is a local problem for local solution. We strenuously object to the passage of the bills for unemployment relief now before the United States Senate.

By action of the board of directors.

THE WISCONSIN STATE CHAMBER OF COMMERCE,
By JOHN L. BARCHARD, President.

Mr. NEELY presented a memorial of sundry citizens of Parkersburg, W. Va., remonstrating against the passage of legislation closing barber shops on Sunday in the District of Columbia, or any other restrictive religious measures, which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. HULL presented memorials of sundry citizens of Knoxville, Concord, and Bearden, Tenn., remonstrating against the passage of legislation closing barber shops on Sunday in the District of Columbia, or any other restrictive religious measures, which were referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. WHEELER presented a resolution adopted by the Butte (Mont.) Woman's Christian Temperance Union, protesting against the proposed resubmission of the eighteenth amendment of the Constitution to be ratified by State conventions or legislatures, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. CAPPER presented a resolution adopted by the Ellis Community Club, of Ellis, Kans., favoring the imposition of a tariff duty of $1 per barrel on crude petroleum, which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented petitions numerously signed by sundry citizens of the District of Columbia, praying for the passage of legislation to regulate the closing of barber shops on Sunday in the District of Columbia, known as the Copeland Sunday health bill, which were referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

He also presented petitions of sundry citizens of Alden, Eureka, Oxford, Plainville, Topeka, and Dickinson and Jewell Counties, all in the State of Kansas, praying for the maintenance of the prohibition law and its enforcement, which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented resolutions adopted by the Ladies Guild of the Methodist Church of Hutchinson; the Dorcas Club and the Missionary Society of the Christian Church of Plainville; the Methodist Episcopal Church and Sunday school of Talmage; the Ladies' Aid Society of Hanston; the adult Sunday school of the First Methodist Episcopal Church of Parsons; and local chapters of the Woman's Christian Temperance Unions of Burr Oak, Oxford, and Plainville, all in the State of Kansas, favoring the maintenance of the prohibition law and its enforcement and protesting against its modification or repeal, which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

PROPOSED ALLOTMENT OF FARM BOARD WHEAT

Mr. CAPPER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an editorial from the Cleveland Plain Dealer and also an editorial from the Washington News. Both editorials comment on the merits of the resolution adopted in the Senate to donate a maximum of 40,000,000 bushels of wheat held by the Grain Stabilization Corporation for the relief of the needy.

I might say, Mr. President, that this stabilization wheat, so called, is not doing anyone any good at present, except perhaps the elevator owners in whose elevators it is stored. The Stabilization Corporation is paying 1½ cents a month storage charges every month on every bushel of it. The fact that the corporation has it in reserve is used by the speculators to help depress the market price of wheat; and in the meantime hundreds of thousands of persons in the United States are in need of bread.

The Senate did a wise and generous thing when it voted to donate 40,000,000 bushels of this wheat for relief purposes. I deeply regret that the resolution did not receive the same support at the other end of the Capitol Building. The needy would have used this food to good advantage.

There being no objection, the editorials were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Cleveland Plain Dealer of February 9, 1932]

USE THIS WHEAT

The House Agricultural Committee shows its vision astigmatized by politics in rejecting the proposal to allot 40,000,000 bushels of Farm Board wheat to relief agencies. This measure, introduced in the upper House by Senator CAPPER, passed that body. It hit hard going as soon as it came into the House.

The objection, presumably, is that if this wheat is taken out of the now useless stores of the Farm Board it might prevent the sale of a similar amount of grain by farmers. This attitude is thoroughly selfish and may not even be as logical as it sounds. There is so much wheat now in storage, in addition to the Farm Board's 180,000,000 bushels, that if the relief agencies went into the market to-day for 40,000,000 more bushels they would not be likely to make enough of a hole in the Nation's wheat bin to help the individual farmer.

The present stock of wheat in the Nation, including the Farm Board's store, was reported a few days ago at 429,000,000 bushels. So the farmer constituents of these Members of the House Agricultural Committee stand to gain little or nothing by the short-sighted attitude of their Representatives. But the relief agencies will lose a valuable source of help if the Capper resolution is allowed to die.

Wheat is one of the cheapest as well as the most nourishing articles of human diet. By its larger use the value of relief dollars can be most amazingly stretched. Palatable meals, mostly of wheat foods, can be served for 3 cents or less a portion, as Prof. Robert E. Brown, of Oberlin, has been preaching to Ohio audiences these many months.

The city of Lorain supplies a current example. The relief committee there aided twice as many families in January as it did in December without increasing the amount spent for groceries. It has given away more than 500 bushels of wheat and is instructing those it helps to use it both in flour and as cereal.

Throughout the Nation relief agencies are finding their resources seriously strained. Meanwhile the Farm Board wheat is eating off its head in storage charges. It will never be sold for anything like what the taxpayers paid for it. Why balk at the common-sense step of making part of it immediately available for the needy?

[From the Washington News]

Amazing as it may seem to the hungry, who might not have been hungry if a small portion of the Federal Farm Board's vast wheat stocks had been made available to them free, the House Agriculture Committee has killed the wheat bill passed by the Senate.

Thus the Democrats in control have refused the simplest way of getting food to the jobless who can not buy it.

The 40,000,000 bushels of wheat which the bill would have made available for free distribution through charitable agencies will continue to fill grain elevators, and each day it will cost the Government more money. Each day this wheat will continue to exert a depressing effect upon the farmers' market.

Speaker GARNER nominally favored the bill, and Chairman JONES, of the Agriculture Committee, voted to report it out. But evidently their desire to feed the hungry was not strong enough.

If GARNER, the Democratic boss, had exerted the power he has heretofore used, the relief measure would have been passed.

Voters who are keeping a campaign score card will debit the Democrats with another costly error.

WILL THE DEMOCRATS ABANDON THE LEAGUE OF NATIONS?

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an editorial from the Winchester (Ky.) Sun of February 6, 1932, entitled "Will the Democrats Abandon the League of Nations?"

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Winchester (Ky.) Sun, February 6, 1932]

WILL THE DEMOCRATS ABANDON THE LEAGUE OF NATIONS?

While the China-Japanese situation is a little less tense, it is far from a peaceful settlement. But this Japanese war spasm demonstrates at least two things.

If there had been no League of Nations, these two countries, and probably a half dozen others, would to-day be at each other's throats, engaged in a most desperate and destructive war of extermination. The league machinery offered and presented the only medium through which a dignified protest and offer of mediation could be made. This factor within the league is well worth its existence and all it has cost, and if this China-Japanese dispute is settled without a bloody war such settlement must be accredited to the existence of the League of Nations.

But the most distressing fact to chronicle is that the conditions in the Far East would never have reached their present state had the United States been a member of the league. Japan never would have placed herself in a position to have the league put in effect article 16—the economic boycott. But with the United States out of the league Japan knew full well that no boycott by other nations would be declared, and if it were it would be impotent, therefore, she was able to and did most arrogantly flaunt the constitution of the league, of which she was a member, in the very faces of the other signatories to that instrument and flippantly say to them by her action, "What are you going to do about it?" The United States is not a member of the league and has refused to enact the Capper resolution which would pledge that country to unite in any economic boycott against any nation which the League of Nations declared to be the aggressor in any war.

With the United States out of the league, no boycott could be made effective, but had it been a member neither Japan nor any other nation would have dared to risk the putting into effect of such a measure. It is perfectly obvious that the present conditions in the Far East are brought about largely, if not entirely, by the failure of the United States to enter the league, and that failure is directly attributable to the Republican Party, headed by the hypocritical Henry Cabot Lodge, together with a group of jealous Republican Senators and supported by the isolationists. However, the Republicans are getting ready to make a backward flop, as Governor Roosevelt, former Secretary of War Newton D. Baker, and other prominent Democratic leaders are easing off of the league as the 1932 elections approach. We are convinced that within a few years we will find the Republican Party advocating the United States' entry into a league, and taking that document as their own child, after they have inveigled the Democrats into a desertion of it.

The eighteenth amendment was a Democratic conception, fostered and promoted by Democrats; however, our leaders in the effete East, our chairman of the national committee (a recent convert from Republicanism), our 1928 candidate for President, all probably with full cellars, repudiated it, whereupon the Republicans, embracing it as a long lost child, championed it as their very own, and with it floating at their masthead marched triumphantly into the White House with the Democratic South following this new and strange standard bearer, so that to-day, among the rank and file, that party is heralded as the "constitutionalist," while the Democratic Party, undeservedly but nevertheless assuredly, as the "nullificationist."

We are not a prophet nor a son of a prophet, but we venture the prediction that the Republicans will pull the same trick with the League of Nations so soon as the Democrats get from under it. The league should not be a political issue, but watch, we say, watch the Republicans, within a few years, make it, with some immaterial changes in form and dress, their paramount issue.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Seventy-eight Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, I want to yield the fullest meed of praise of which I am capable of expression to the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] and the Senator from Colorado [Mr. COSTIGAN] for the magnificent work they have done in connection with the measure that is pending now before the Senate, and to say to them, too, that that work, no matter what may be the fate of the bill that is before us now, has not been done in vain.

No more intelligent hearings, in my opinion, were ever conducted by a Senate committee than were conducted by the committee over which the Senator from Wisconsin presides. No more informative hearings have ever been brought to this body than this bill has brought after the deliberations of the committee headed by the Senator from Wisconsin.

So I congratulate them upon their work; I congratulate the Senate that they have done it; and I am very glad to stand here to-day, sir, lifting my voice as best I can in behalf of the effort that has been theirs and the effort that I deem essential in order that this Government may do its full duty unto its people.

Mr. President, I have listened to the debate with the utmost care. I believe, as was expressed by the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. REED] yesterday, that all here are actuated by a like desire, and that the motives of none are open to question. I believe, as was said by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. FESS] in his remarks the other day, that the question after all, perhaps, is one of fact; and I believe that there is no man who will stand upon the floor of the Senate and, where a question of relief to the suffering is concerned, will say otherwise than that if he believed the relief were necessary he would be perfectly willing to accord it.

We have advanced, therefore, somewhat in this debate. We have advanced, sir, the same distance in the matter of the administration of relief. And so, whatever may be the ultimate result of the contest that has been waged here so eloquently and so well, whatever may be the result of the particular bill that has been presented by Messrs. LA FOLLETTE and COSTIGAN, a great service has been rendered to the people of this country in the recognition finally of the principle that if necessity exists in our economic life there will be direct action by the Congress of the United States for the relief of any suffering that may transpire.

I may be permitted, sir, to say, I think, that the difference of opinion that exists upon this floor, particularly upon this side of the Chamber, arises not alone from the determination of the fact, as has been stated here by various Senators. It arises, sir, from another cause, much more fundamental; a cause, sir, that after all must ultimately see its decision in a democracy and in the Congress of the United States. It arises from the irreconcilable conflict of two different philosophies of government—the philosophy of government that believes, first, in dealing with the top, and there affording, even upon a whispered request, every aid that may be asked, but forgetting that which is at the bottom; and the philosophy of government that believes government represents not those at the top alone, not those who whisper their commands and have them obeyed over night, but that government, after all, consists of all the people of the United States, and that where relief may be sought by one class and accorded as an emergency, relief may be asked legitimately and may be accorded the other class as an emergency, too.

These warring philosophies of government are in juxtaposition to-day upon this measure.

Upon this side there has ever been the philosophy that you must not take government into business or into any activity which individuals may perform. There has ever been the assertion here that individualism in industry, in finance, in government, in every human activity, shall control, and control alone; and these gentlemen who hold to such a belief, who have clung so tenaciously to it that they would not even permit a small electrical plant paid for by the people to be operated in behalf of its people, and its people alone—these gentlemen, clinging tenaciously to that belief, find themselves to-day with that belief, though they may not admit it, shattered by the inexorable logic of events and that oneiromancy has its fallible moments.

I stood upon this floor a couple of years ago when the farm bill was being passed at the instance of the administration. I stood here, and I twitted my associates upon the Republican side with the fact that that bill was taking the United States Government into every kind of business under the sun. They denied it. They looked at me askance, and they thought that I was indulging in idle, vain fulminations concerning a measure the administration said, willy-nilly, should be passed by Congress. We find, after a couple of years of administration of that farm bill, which was denied here to be of the character that I then insisted it was, and concerning which I twitted my brethren upon this side—we find, after two or more years of administration, not only has the United States Government, under the guise of a farm-relief measure, gone into every conceivable organization and every conceivable business, but we find that it has gone into the wheat pits of Chicago, where it was taken by the smart lads up there just as Grant took Richmond, and we find that it went into cotton gambling of the South. Only a couple of hundred millions did it waste. That is of no consequence, because the command from on high had been given to us to waste it. So were wasted a couple of hundred million dollars of the people's money in gambling in the wheat pit and in the cotton market—gambling!—and doing it notwithstanding every economist on earth understood that they could not metamorphose the rigid rules of economy in the endeavor that was theirs.

I question not their good faith in their gambling in the wheat pit or in the cotton market. That is not the point. The point is that this side of the Chamber, pretending that it would never permit the Government to go into any kind of business under any circumstances, obeyed its orders and passed the bill and took the Government into every kind of bizarre undertaking it was possible to take the Government into under that bill; and disaster, of course, has attended that particular measure.

That is not all, sir. Gentlemen inveigh against $375,000,000 or more concerning this bill. They speak about a raid upon the Treasury, and what an unfortunate thing it is. Sir, it is only a month and a half ago that I stood upon this floor practically alone objecting to $250,000,000 being taken from the United States by a moratorium and put upon the backs of American taxpayers; $250,000,000 awarded to international bankers here and across the sea. To-day, sir, just as in the matter of the Farm Board's activities, we find that the moratorium was a dud, that it aided no people in reality, and that it permitted only short-term credits of international bankers to be paid on the other side of the water, and short-term credits upon this side of the water, as well.

Mr. President, we are tarrying along now in a fashion which seems incredible. There was a great monarch of France who once said, "I am the state," and, enunciating that doctrine, he did as he saw fit, not only with peoples but with the finances of his realm.

Following him came another Louis, and his mistress had a saying in which she again and again indulged. "After us, the deluge." It seems to me to-day that as we are indulging in legislation such as never before has been considered by any nation on earth in peace time, some of our brethern somewhere are saying, "After us, the deluge."

It may be that the deluge will not come until November next. It may be that it may be postponed beyond the month of June, and during that period all of us may cry in accord upon this side of the Chamber, "After us, the deluge," and crying thus, sir, we may justify any kind of legislation, any dipping into the Treasury except dipping into the Treasury for just human beings.

Mr. President, it is a complicated machine, this governmental machine. It is complicated in its parts, it is complicated in all its movements. It is a beautiful machine in conception. There it stands, majestic in power, with its great driving wheels, its shining parts, its burnished brass. Here we stand basking in the reflected light of the burnished brass upon that machine. One philosophy of government sees the brightness, the great driving power, the wheels; sees, indeed, those things which are ever present to the eye, and, seeing those, believes that government consists solely of the great wheels, the driving power, the boilers, and the majestic machine which sits before us, and which is so bright in all its light.

There is another part of that machine, sir. Down underneath, in the dirt and grime, there are bolts and there are nuts and there are screws as necessary to the machine as the great working parts above. Down underneath, in the dirt and the grime, are little parts which perform their function in that governmental machine, and perform that function, sir, in just as important a fashion as the great driving forces which are present to the eye.

Some of us, with our philosophy of government, look not alone upon the brightness before us of that governmental machine which dazzles us with its power and with its magnificence; we look down underneath, too, in the dirt and the grime, to where there are men and women and children, men and women and children calling for just the same activity, care, and attention on our part that these great parts which are before our eyes demand and receive.

The difficulty with the legislation which has been passed thus far by the Congress in this depression has been that it has all begun at the top. Every bit of it has begun at the top, and every particle of it has been designed to brighten those great parts of the governmental machine which are ever present before us, and which mesmerize us with their very power.

Now, sir, finally we come down to the bottom; we come down to those who are little able to aid themselves. Inarticulate are they. No power emanates from them. Inarticulate are they; no ability theirs to arouse in us the servile desire of haste in their behalf. But they are human beings, just like you, sir, and just like me. You may resent it. I glory in it, that they are just like you and just like me, human beings; and among those human beings are not only the men but the women and the little children as well, and for the first time in the history of this depression, thanks to the assiduity and the ability and the pertinacity and the perseverance of Messrs. LA FOLLETTE and COSTIGAN, we are dealing with men and women and children who demand of the United States Government some sort of relief in this horrid period of disaster.

I am well aware that my friend the Senator from Pennsylvania eloquently said yesterday that we did not know what a depression really was. I recall how he painted 1819, when, after the Napoleonic wars, there was a cataclysmic period in this and every other country. I do not recall exactly what occurred in 1819, although I am almost old enough to do so, Mr. President, but I venture the assertion that more banks have failed in this depression in one State of the Northwest than the whole Nation possessed in 1819.

The Senator referred again to the black period of 1873. A black period indeed it was. He painted the picture of what transpired at that time as indicating that there was no cause for alarm now.

I recognize, I think, the value with some people of psychology, and for the last three years I have been hearing about how essential it was that we should do certain things for their psychological effect upon our people. I have read of statements that were made again and again and again and again of how prosperity was just around the corner, and that we were about to meet it if we turned and went the other way. I have heard that we were not in any period of real depression, that it was a state of mind, and that state of mind we could easily relieve if we forgot our fears.

The attitude that was taken by the Senator from Pennsylvania yesterday was that we were in a state of panic, and that that state of panic, I take it, from his view, was responsible for our particular plight now.

He said, indeed, and I quote him here in order that I may be entirely fair with him:

> Everything is sound in America, except we are in a stew of panic that can not last.

"Everything is sound in America, except that we are all in a stew of panic that can not last."

"Everything is sound in America!" Repeal, then, your Reconstruction Corporation act. There never was such an act passed in the history of any nation on the face of the earth in peace time. I challenge contradiction of that statement.

Repeal it if there is no panic, and if everything is sound, repeal it. The very fact that it was enacted, and enacted in the fashion that it was, is the demonstration that we have reached a period in this Nation when there must be relief.

I say relief, and I do not mean relief alone to bankers and to railroad people. Relief, I say, not only to bankers and to railroads, but relief just to God's common all, the common people of this land.

Direct action you have taken in your Reconstruction Corporation in behalf of your banks and your railroads. Direct action you will take in other regards. I quarrel not with it. I recognize that the situation is such that it may be absolutely essential that we do the things which have been done. But I say that when you do them, do not deny that the fact exists that relief is required to be given human beings, and do not say that that relief you accord by congressional action shall be extended only to these great corporations.

The Farm Board act, the Reconstruction Corporation act, all the things we have done of late in the nature of legislation, that which we are going soon to do, all are done because an emergency exists, because we believe it essential for the protection and preservation of business in this country, because there is a state of affairs existing such as has been described down the Avenue that rivals a state of war, and that state of affairs existing we have legislated as we have in behalf of banks and in behalf of railroads, and now some of the rest of us demand that we legislate in behalf of babies and of unprotected women, too.

That is the whole nub of this contest; that is the whole reason why there is a fight here over this bill. All there is to it is, are you going to recognize the trouble, the difficulty, the cataclysm, the catastrophe, the calamity which have come to us in the last few years in relation to business and deny it in relation to human beings?

The testimony is here before the Senate. I have before me, and I will not attempt to read it, the testimony from the Department of Labor of the United States Government. That testimony shows what? Unemployment, as never before in our history, with all its horrible consequences. Malnutrition in children.

That testimony shows what? Women about to become mothers underfed themselves.

That testimony shows what? The percentage of little children with rickets increasing greatly.

That testimony shows what? Tuberculosis rampant among the weak and among the children.

Then, tell me that you will give $2,000,000,000 to bankers and to railroads and will deny $375,000,000 of direct relief unto these children and those who need it most?

Mr. President, not long ago, very recently, a magazine article appeared that was very interesting to my Republican brethren. I read it to them because I know the force of the particular article is such that at once they will admit not only its verity but its absolute infallibility and authority. The article I read, sir, is from the Magazine of Wall Street, and I read it that our brethren may understand just exactly how the situation and our legislation is viewed. The title of the article is "The Irony of Big Business Seeking Governmental Management." That would have been an impossibility a few years ago. It is an impossibility now under the philosophy of some of my friends upon this side. It is an impossibility under the cloaked opposition that may exist in this body to the Government doing anything as a government in behalf of just people. The article proceeds:

> It should be clearly understood that both the program outlined above and the frankly inflationary measures that may be later adopted are socialistic.

Ah, listen to that, gentlemen who are here representing the grand old Republican Party. The magazine of Wall Street tells you that what you have done is socialistic. Hide your heads and go about in sackcloth and ashes the rest of your days! Socialism you have embraced in what you have done! I am not frightened of it in the necessity that exists, but since you have made your adventure into socialism in behalf of banks and railroads, let us take a step just over the line in behalf of men and women and children who need governmental aid.

I continue with the article:

> Big business, always complaining of public intervention in economic matters, is now as insistent for governmental relief as the farmers have ever been.

Oh, what a dreadful thing! O ye who come from the farming districts in this country, who heard the arguments that have been made upon this floor when farm relief was suggested, just think of that! "Big business now," says the big business organ, "is doing exactly the thing and even worse than the farmers ever sought to do." What a marvelous confession, and yet there is nothing here to worry about, says our friend the Senator from Pennsylvania, when big business buries its shibboleth of fear in order to come cap in hand to the Government—nothing here that should affect us, as a matter of fact, at this peculiar juncture of affairs when big business comes to us. I admit all it needs to do is to come upon our floor and whisper, and we act. But when big business carries us into the socialistic field in the particular legislation we have adopted, why can we not listen to the cries of the babes with rickets, of those who have contracted tuberculosis, of those who suffer from malnutrition, of the mothers without sufficient to feed themselves? Why can you not respond to their cry and do for them what you have done for bankers and for railroad corporations?

The article continues:

> In fact the Reconstruction Finance Corporation is regarded primarily as relief from the top down through the banks and railroads. It is earnestly supported by the great bankers—

Marvelous!

> the railroad presidents—

More marvelous still!

> and the industrialists. Members of Congress, as they vote for this and other measures, are sarcastically remarking that the very men who have always advised Congress to keep out of business are now taking the lead in forcing it into business.

I read in the newspapers yesterday—I do not pretend to say whether the reports were accurate or not; I do not know; and I state merely that I am referring to newspaper articles—about inflationary measures that are going to be introduced or have been introduced in the Congress, and under which there would be such a tremendous revival that no longer would anyone be in difficulty for finances. As I read the story of inflation in some of the papers I thought of "Sockless Jerry Simpson," in days that most of you have forgotten, of Peffer, who sat in this body in the seat that is now occupied by the very able and distinguished Senator from Kansas [Mr. CAPPER]. I think if he sat there now, with that great tangled beard of his, out of which he may have taken a robin and a wren, how he would chortle with glee as he read of an inflationary measure that would give us $2,000,000,000 more of currency in circulation.

We are going far along. We are taking great strides. Some of those people of the past, some of those who preached their doctrine upon deaf ears years and years ago, if the grave enables them to see and understand what is transpiring here to-day, may laugh and may chortle, and may say that finally unto them has come that which was their due.

"No crisis, practically," says our friend from Pennsylvania. "Everything is sound in America, except we are all in a stew of panic that can not last. People can not remain scared indefinitely," said he. "We are coming out of the depression just about as fast as we went into it," said he. Where have I heard that language before? I would not say that I have heard it down the Avenue again and again, again and again. I will not pretend that out of the door of the White House, as the industrialists marched in the latter part of 1929 or in 1930, we heard just that sort of thing. I do not know, but the language is very, very familiar.

We have no real difficulties now, it may be said. We are merely in a panic of fear, and fear can not last. That may be so with some; that may be so, Mr. President, with some of the smug gentlemen who have never felt a loss and who do not understand what common people are. That may be so, sir, with those who legislate exclusively for banks and for railroad companies. But, sir, it is not so for the man who tramps the streets without a job. It is not so for the woman who sits at home in grim despair, waiting, waiting, waiting in the hope that she may receive relief. It is not, so, sir, with the children now from malnutrition suffering all the ills of childhood which we thought we had escaped.

It is not so, sir, in the walks of your life and mine, for I, sir, have no shame in saying that every man I know, every man I love, every man who has been my intimate for more than 45 years, walks the streets to-day practically broke. To tell him that he has just a panic of fear and that there is nothing the matter with this country is, my dear sir, like in the olden times when naively those who understood little of what the people were suffering said, "If they can not have bread, let them eat grass."

It comes from absolute inability to understand just what are the positions in which we find ourselves to-day and what are the conditions which confront us to-day and from a lack of comprehension of just common humanity. There is an inability in some men in politics, some men in high office, some men in high position—there is an inability for some men to know what there is in the heart and in the mind and in the blood of the individual who walks the street just an ordinary man. We who keep in touch with conditions in this country know what those conditions are when the reports are before us from the United States Government of their effect upon the children of this land.

Mr. President, we have fed children before. We have appropriated money in the past in order that children might receive that nourishment which a Divine Providence would always give to them. We have fed children before by appropriations that were staggering in amount in the Congress of the United States. We have fed them, sir, at the instance of the very power which to-day opposes this measure to aid children in this land. It is only eight years ago that in a demand for an appropriation which was accorded him the President of the United States said:

> Our only hope is that the next generation will be better than this one, and there is no hope if they are to be stunted and degenerate from undernourishment. I recognize the arguments that may be brought against charitable actions, but I refuse to apply those arguments to children.

When Mr. Hoover uttered those words he was eternally right. His spokesmen upon the floor of the Senate, when they deny them, are viciously wrong. He was right then. He would not then apply harsh rules to children. I ask that they be not applied to children to-day. I ask and the bill asks that those who are children and those who are men and those who are women who require assistance of the United States Government be accorded that assistance.

There is a difference in the viewpoint, as I said in the beginning of my remarks. There are those who look naively upon others who are less fortunately situated than themselves, who say with a smug philosophy which we thought exploded years ago, "Let every man be pleased to fill the position in which the Creator has placed him and let him not covet any other." That is the philosophy of a certain class of superior beings in dealing with just human beings. Remember the greatest man in all history was the poorest. Remember, ye who have little thought of those who are suffering to-day. He ever had before Him and in His mind the poor and the weak and the suffering, and He has left to us the beautiful legacy of caring for little children and for those who require care.

To-day, Mr. President, we stand in the consideration of this bill in a peculiar sort of contest. It does not make any difference whether the bill passes or not. My opinion at this time is that it is very likely to see success in this body, and it will be a very proud moment for the body when ultimately it shall have met the success it deserves here, but, Mr. President, this, I repeat, is the irreconcilable conflict: Are we going to do one thing for big business, for the corporations, for the railroads, and for the banks, and are we going to do it as a war measure in reality—for that is what it has been termed—as an emergency measure—for that is what it has been asserted to be—and are we going to deny the same kind of relief unto just ordinary human beings?

That is the problem that is presented in this bill. I am glad, sir, to take my stand with the proponents of the bill and to do what little lies in my power in its behalf. Indeed, I am very glad to have the opportunity, not only to do justice unto one class of our people but to endeavor to do justice unto all. When we have recognized the plight of business; when we have remedied that plight as best we may; when we have accorded business all that busines said it wanted, and have done it overnight, with little knowledge upon the part of our people; when we have enacted legislation that is designed solely to enable great industrialists and banks and railroad magnates to have what they claim, sir, let us do something in behalf of the other class that constitutes this Government, the class that constitutes our people, those who do the job in time of peace and those who fight the fight in time of war.

When Mr. Hoover made his statement eight years ago concerning children, I repeat, he was eternally right; but he was speaking of children beyond the sea. Sir, I ask you, is a child of Europe entitled to one treatment from the United States Government and a child in America to be denied the very same treatment from the United States Government? When did we alter the rule of conduct in this country so that we responded to Europe first and America last? This is an American question, involving American children, involving American men and American women. For our own country, sir, and in the name of humanity for once in this administration, let us be American-minded and look after Americans.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I desire to propose the unanimous-consent agreement which I send to the desk; and, inasmuch as a time is fixed for a final vote on the measure to which it relates, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Let the proposed unanimous-consent agreement be first read.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

Ordered, by unanimous consent, that after the hour of 2 o'clock p. m. on the calendar day of Monday, February 15, 1932, no Senator shall speak more than once or longer than 15 minutes upon the bill (S. 3045) to provide for cooperation by the Federal Government with the several States in relieving the hardship and suffering caused by unemployment, and for other purposes, or upon any pending amendment.

Ordered further, That on said calendar day of Monday, February 15, 1932, at not later than the hour of 5 o'clock p. m., the Senate will proceed to vote without further debate upon any amendment that may be pending, or that may be proposed, and upon the bill through its regular parliamentary stages to its final disposition.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Bingham	Broussard	Carey
Austin	Black	Bulow	Coolidge
Bailey	Blaine	Byrnes	Costigan
Bankhead	Borah	Capper	Cutting
Barkley	Bratton	Caraway	Dale

Dill	Jones	Norbeck	Townsend
Fess	Kean	Norris	Trammell
Fletcher	Kendrick	Nye	Tydings
George	Keyes	Oddie	Vandenberg
Glass	King	Patterson	Wagner
Goldsborough	La Follette	Pittman	Walsh, Mass.
Gore	Lewis	Reed	Walsh, Mont.
Harrison	Logan	Robinson, Ark.	Waterman
Hatfield	McGill	Schall	Watson
Hawes	McKellar	Sheppard	Wheeler
Hayden	McNary	Smoot	White
Hebert	Metcalf	Steiwer
Howell	Morrison	Stephens
Hull	Moses	Thomas, Idaho

The VICE PRESIDENT. Seventy-seven Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present. Is there objection to the unanimous-consent agreement proposed by the Senator from Oregon [Mr. McNARY], which will again be read?

The Chief Clerk again read the proposed unanimous-consent agreement.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, a few minutes ago from a conversation with the Senator from Michigan [Mr. COUZENS] I understood that he had a suggestion to make with respect to lengthening the time of debate from 15 minutes to 30 minutes. I requested him to be present. I have sent for him and think he will be here in a moment. In his absence I would hesitate to have the agreement entered into. However, Mr. President, I do not know of anyone who is prepared to go forward with the debate to-day. May I ask the Senator from Wisconsin if there is any Senator whom he knows who desires to continue the discussion?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. So far as I know, there is no Senator who is prepared to proceed this afternoon with the debate upon the bill.

Mr. McNARY. Then if the unanimous-consent agreement shall be entered into, I shall ask the Senate to take a recess until Monday next, at 12 o'clock.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I should like to be recognized before the Senator makes that motion.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the unanimous-consent agreement proposed by the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I am advised that the Senator from Michigan will be here in just a moment. I may add that if the debate shall be concluded on Monday in conformity with the provisions of the proposed unanimous-consent agreement, then on Tuesday we may go forward with the Calendar of General Orders, which is now somewhat extensive, and with the Executive Calendar, and then we may take up some unfinished business at that time.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield, I understood also that there was some likelihood that there might be a report from the Committee on Banking and Currency which would have to do with legislation of great importance, and that that might also be taken up after the final disposition of the pending measure, if it shall be the pleasure of the Senate to do so.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I take the liberty, in the absence of the Senator from Michigan, of asking a modification of the proposal which I made a few moments ago. I gathered from the Senator from Michigan that he desired the time for debate extended from 15 minutes to 30 minutes, and the final vote to be taken at 6 o'clock.

Mr. COUZENS entered the Chamber.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the unanimous-consent proposal made by the Senator from Oregon, which the clerk will read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Ordered, by unanimous consent, that after the hour of 2 o'clock p. m. on the calendar day of Monday, February 15, 1932, no Senator shall speak more than once or longer than 15 minutes upon the bill (S. 3045) to provide for cooperation by the Federal Government with the several States in relieving the hardship and suffering caused by unemployment, and for other purposes, or upon any pending amendment.

Ordered further, That on said calendar day of Monday, February 15, 1932, at not later than the hour of 5 o'clock p. m., the Senate will proceed to vote without further debate upon any amendment that may be pending or that may be proposed, and upon the bill through its regular parliamentary stages to its final disposition.

Mr. COUZENS. Does that mean 15 minutes on an amendment and 15 minutes on the bill?

Mr. McNARY. That is my construction. It gives 30 minutes on the substitute the Senator may have to suggest to the one now pending.

Mr. COUZENS. The language is "or any amendment." Does that mean 15 minutes on any amendment, no matter how many amendments may be offered?

Mr. McNARY. It does.

Mr. COUZENS. So that under the unanimous-consent agreement proposed a Senator could talk almost any length of time by offering amendments. Is that correct?

Mr. McNARY. That is correct.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Only on the pending amendment, however. A Senator could speak for 15 minutes on each amendment, and there would be only one speech of 15 minutes on the bill.

Mr. COUZENS. Yes; but I understand that no matter how many amendments might be offered, a Senator would have 15 minutes on each amendment; so that, as a matter of fact, the amendments could be extended out so as to consume the whole time. Is that correct?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Not later than 5 o'clock.

Mr. McNARY. I am willing, in order to meet the Senator's proposition, to extend the time to 30 minutes on the amendment and substitute, and have the final vote at 6 o'clock. Will that meet his objection?

Mr. COUZENS. I think that is better; but I still am not clear as to whether one Senator might not get the floor and talk for the whole time on the bill and each amendment that might be pending thereto.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I think I understand that proposition. The 15 minutes applies to the bill and the amendment then pending, but it does not mean 15 minutes on the bill and every amendment that may be offered.

Mr. COUZENS. That was the parliamentary inquiry I made.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. McNARY. I yield to the Senator from Kentucky.

Mr. BARKLEY. It would be much easier for one Senator to get the floor and occupy it for the entire time if he has 30 minutes on the bill and 30 minutes on each amendment than if he has 15 minutes on the bill and 15 minutes on each amendment.

Mr. COUZENS. That is the reason why I was trying to get the interpretation of the Chair as to whether this 15-minute or 30-minute limitation was upon each amendment, no matter how many there were, or whether the 15-minute or 30-minute limitation was upon all pending amendments.

Mr. BARKLEY. While only one amendment can be pending at a time, of course there may be an unlimited number of amendments printed and lying on the table.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Only one amendment can be pending. A Senator would have 15 minutes on the bill and 15 minutes on the pending amendment.

Mr. COUZENS. I should like to ask just what is the advantage of having this matter go over to-day for the purpose of getting this unanimous-consent agreement. Why can we not stay here to-day and finish it?

Mr. McNARY. I can answer that. It is proposed in all fairness to those who are absent. There are a great many, I think probably 18 or 19 Senators absent, many of whom desire to be present and register their votes, but they were unable to obtain pairs. That operated disadvantageously on both sides of the aisle; and to meet that particular situation, so that all could be present, I thought it a matter of wisdom that some time should be set in the future for the final vote.

There is no reason why any Senator who wants to discuss the bill may not go forward to-day. That has no connection with the time set for a final vote. I can not see how the Senator from Michigan would sacrifice any advantage he may have by reason of the adoption of this unanimous-consent agreement. In view of the fact that he has pending a substitute, therefore, I am willing in order to meet his situation, if it does so, to extend the time to 30 minutes upon the bill and amendments.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE and Mr. BARKLEY addressed the Chair.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Oregon yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. McNARY. I yield to the Senator from Wisconsin, who was first on his feet.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I was about to suggest to the Senator from Michigan that if he desires that provision incorporated in the unanimous-consent agreement, there ought to be some time, prior to the time fixed for a final vote on the bill, when the limit would be shorter than 30 minutes, because otherwise after 2 o'clock each Senator who got the floor, if he desired to use it, would have an hour. He would have half an hour on the pending amendment and half an hour on the bill. Between 2 o'clock and 5 o'clock there are only three hours; and it might result in only three Senators having an opportunity to speak.

Mr. COUZENS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. McNARY. I yield.

Mr. COUZENS. I suggest that the time be extended to 6 o'clock. That may overcome some of the objections of the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. McNARY. I am willing to extend the time.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. McNARY. Yes.

Mr. BARKLEY. I understand it is the Senator's plan to recess over until Monday.

Mr. McNARY. It is.

Mr. BARKLEY. There are a large number of bottled-up speeches yet undelivered on this bill. Why should we not meet at 11 o'clock instead of 12 o'clock Monday?

Mr. McNARY. I am perfectly willing to do that.

Mr. BARKLEY. So far as I am concerned, I should like to go on with it to-day and to-morrow.

Mr. McNARY. Let me propose a change—that we meet at 11 o'clock on Monday.

Mr. COUZENS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Oregon yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. McNARY. I yield.

Mr. COUZENS. There are to be meetings of the Banking and Currency Committee on Monday that have been arranged for a week or more by the Senator from Indiana [Mr. WATSON], who is chairman of the subcommittee; and obviously we can not be on the floor and holding these hearings at the same time.

Mr. McNARY. Then, Mr. President, let me suggest that we meet at the accustomed hour of 12 o'clock and have the final vote at 7 o'clock.

Mr. BARKLEY. I thought the Committee on Banking and Currency had already reported out all the inflationary bills it could.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me for a suggestion?

Mr. McNARY. I yield to the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. FESS. Why would it not be a good plan to leave the proposal as suggested by the Senator from Oregon, with the amendment that the Senator from Michigan [Mr. COUZENS] shall have 30 minutes on the amendment he proposes? I think everybody is agreed to that.

Mr. McNARY. That is certainly very agreeable, if the Senator so desires. He would have it under the proposal I have already made. He has 15 minutes on the bill and 15 minutes on the amendment.

Mr. COUZENS. I am not suggesting that any change be made on my account.

Mr. McNARY. The Senator will have full opportunity. Would it not be well, then, to commence at 12 o'clock on Monday, and have the final vote at or before 7 o'clock?

Mr. COUZENS. That is entirely satisfactory to me.

Mr. McNARY. Then I propose that modification.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Oregon yield to the Senator from Oklahoma?

Mr. McNARY. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. I have no objection to the time of convening on Monday, but I shall have to object to fixing a time for a final vote; and, if I can have the time, I will state in a moment my objection.

When the bill is finally perfected, ready for a vote, if in my opinion the authorization is not sufficiently broad, I desire to offer a new section on the authorization clause; and at that time I should like to have a few minutes to explain my reason for offering the amendment. It will not take more than 5 or 10 or 15 minutes, but I do not want to be cut off from that opportunity.

I have no objection to an agreement to have a vote on Monday, but I shall object to fixing a definite time.

Mr. McNARY. The Senator desires an opportunity to explain his proposal, which he says would come when?

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Immediately before the final vote is taken. After the bill is perfected, if the authorization section is not as broad as I think it should be, I desire to offer an amendment broadening it, and then I desire for a few moments to explain my position.

Mr. COUZENS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. McNARY. I yield.

Mr. COUZENS. I think this matter had better go over until Monday, then, and see what we can do, because if Senators are going to make all of these reservations, the agreement will not mean anything finally, anyway.

Mr. McNARY. Very well, Mr. President. I think it is generally understood that we all should be here then, and that a vote probably will be taken Monday.

I now move a recess——

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I desire to obtain recognition before a recess is taken.

Mr. McNARY. Very well.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE obtained the floor.

RECESS

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, in view of the situation, I move that the Senate take a recess until 12 o'clock noon on Monday.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 1 o'clock and 37 minutes p. m.) the Senate took a recess until Monday, February 15, 1932, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

FRIDAY, FEBRUARY 12, 1932

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, may we be thankful to-day for a Nation at peace, for a Nation that seeks in every wise to promote international cooperation and brotherhood. We thank Thee, our Father, for the sweep of its ideas and for the challenge of its ideals, and for a Republic whose glory is not in titles nor ranks. To-day we take courage and inspiration from the great sons of our historic past, and especially for the great commoner who sprang from the loins of the common soil. As long as we remain a people our poor lads will look down the lanes of the years and dream the old dreams, feel the old thrills, and be stung by his might. O more and more bring together all sections of our country. Be pleased, O Lord, to remember our President and our Speaker. Be Thou Emmanuel to all who are toiling and struggling, to all who are tempted and distressed by trial. O be near all who are suffering from the pangs of hunger or are harassed by poverty; but be very, very near all who are sick with famine of soul. Bring all creeds into a common circle; may they lean charitably and sympathetically upon one another; and, merciful Father, breathe into the hearts of all men the spirit of humanity. Through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

A message from the Senate by Mr. Craven, its principal clerk, announced that the Senate had agreed to the amendments of the House to a bill of the following title:

S. 1306. An act to provide for the incorporation of the District of Columbia Commission, George Washington Bicentennial.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE

Mr. WILLIAMS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the bill (S. 2396) to amend section 11 of the act approved February 22, 1889 (25 Stat. 676), relating to the admission into the Union of the States of North Dakota, South Dakota, Montana, and Washington, referred to the Committee on the Territories, be referred to the Committee on the Public Lands.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent that the bill S. 2396, referred to the Committee on the Territories, be rereferred to the Committee on the Public Lands. The Chair understands that the chairmen of the two committees are agreeable to the transfer.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Texas. Yes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

FRED J. KERN

Mr. KARCH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for two minutes, and for leave to extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. KARCH. Mr. Speaker, it is my sad mission at this moment to announce to the House the recent death of Hon. Fred J. Kern, who served in this Chamber during the Fifty-seventh Congress.

Mr. Kern represented at the time the eighteenth congressional district of Illinois, virtually the present twenty-second congressional district of that State, which I now have the honor to represent in this distinguished body.

Mr. Kern was born on a farm in St. Clair County, Ill., on the 2d day of September, 1864, and remained a resident of that State and of that county throughout the entire period of his life. He died at Belleville, Ill., on the 9th day of last November, at the age of 67 years, 2 months, and 7 days. He is survived by his wife and two sons.

His circumstances compelled him to work for a living at an early age. His first employment after leaving the farm was that of a coal miner. Later he taught country school, and in the year 1891, having discovered his genius, he ventured into the journalistic field.

In that year he purchased an interest in the Belleville Daily News-Democrat, one of the oldest newspapers in Illinois, later becoming the sole owner of the institution, which, under his efficient guidance and powerful editorship became, as he left it, one of the largest and most influential newspapers in the State of Illinois outside of the metropolis of Chicago.

Mr. Kern possessed a brilliant mind and a most remarkable memory. He leaves a reputation of having owned the largest and best selected private library in the State of Illinois, and of having read every volume of it. He was liberally versed in every branch of knowledge.

I know of no one who excelled him in the mastery of the English language. He was equally adept in the most savage contumely and tenderest eulogy. He wielded the keen edge of invective and sarcasm and ridicule with the deft hand of a Saladin, yet, in his serener moods, his diction rivaled the erudite and the elegant style of Woodrow Wilson. His indomitable courage of conviction and dynamic eloquence won for him the tribute of having been one of the great orators of his time.

He was a Democrat of the Jeffersonian type, which creed he promulgated with untiring and unwavering constancy.

In the dark and disheartening days of his party's adversities, when countless numbers of its adherents faltered in their fealty, when its national leaders sulked in their loyalty and many of them even renounced the principles and doctrines of the immortal leader, Mr. Kern, like a lonely soldier, carried on and on, and of him it may well be said that but for Fred J. Kern and the wide influence of his newspaper there would not have been a semblance of party organization in the southern half of Illinois in 1928.

Mr. Kern was not an ordinary man. He belonged to that type we call supermen. Physically he was of iron endurance; intellectually, a prodigy; spiritually, benign to a fault. He dissipated not a moment of his life in dalliance—always at work.

Fearless in denouncing vicious systems and malefactors against society, he was always ready to meet in physical combat—though one handed, as he unfortunately was—the men, and there were many of them, who resented his righteous vituperation with the challenge to arms.

He cringed before no human terror. It was his editorial excoriation that broke up the late savage and predatory careers of Glenn Young and Charley Birger in southern Illinois, the most notorious outlaws that ever terrified society; yet he feared not to walk straight into their rendezvous to investigate their diabolical conspiracies and sanguinary activities.

Single-handed and alone, he fought and destroyed the Ku-Klux Klan, which terrorized the inhabitants and dominated the politics of southern Illinois for four long and bloody years under the leadership of the same Glenn Young.

As a humanitarian Mr. Kern takes his place alongside Altgeld and Bryan and Wilson and Lincoln. The dying words of Altgeld, "I would rather touch a star and die a pauper than grovel in the dirt with millions," was his life's motto.

Above the turmoil of excitement that surged around him his spirit was serene and kindly—

> As some tall cliff which rears its awful form,
> Swells from the vale and midway leaves the storm,
> Though round its breast the rolling clouds are spread,
> Eternal sunshine settles on its head.

During the administration of Edward F. Dunne, Governor of Illinois from 1914 to 1918, Mr. Kern was chairman of what is known in that State as the board of administration, under which the charitable and penal institutions are managed and controlled.

Entering upon this position, he found many forms of cruelties, inefficiencies, and archaic and wasteful systems in vogue. In his zeal for the higher humanities he abolished each and every one of these systems and vices, which seemed so impregnably enthroned, and modernized and humanized these institutions from top to bottom.

Barbaric methods of discipline were banished from penitentiaries. The insane were tenderly controlled. The newest and most scientific methods of correction and cure were inaugurated. The most skillful physicians and psychiatrists to be found in the country were provided for these unfortunates. At the end of his administration these institutions stood out as the models for all the States in the Union.

As a Member of this House, his career was as spectacular as it was brief. His profound intelligence and his deep understanding of the problems of his country readily impressed his colleagues in the Fifty-seventh Congress, and enabled him to gain a prominence throughout the Nation rarely coming to a Member of only one term.

There still remain three Members in the present House who were his contemporaries—the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. POU], the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HAUGEN], and the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. SHALLENBERGER].

I recall, having been his secretary, his most intimate associates and friends in that session as having been Burleson and Henry and Ball of Texas and De Armond and Clark of Missouri.

His outstanding attributes in life were his honesty in public life and his unswerving devotion to the cause of the common people. I know of no one who rendered a greater service in the interest of good government than he. The Nation suffers the loss of one of its very best citizens.

Truly it has been said, Mr. Speaker, "What shadows we are! What shadows we pursue!"

> As shadows cast by cloud and sun
> Flit in the summer's grass,
> So in Thy sight, Almighty One,
> Earth's generations pass;
> And as the years, an endless host,
> Come pressing swiftly on,
> The brightest names that earth can boast,
> Just glisten and are gone.

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE REGULATIONS

Mr. JONES. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD the corrected regulations prepared by the Department of Agriculture governing loans to be made to farmers.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

Mr. UNDERHILL. Reserving the right to object, and I shall not object if the gentleman insists, but might I suggest that the value of this is so great that it would be in a much more convenient form for the public if it were published as a House document. It would be much better to consult the Committee on Printing and have it published as a House document.

Mr. JONES. I think that is a good suggestion, and if it is in order, I make that request.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman can not do that by unanimous consent. The Chair will say that the printing of documents is governed by statute.

Mr. JONES. Then, Mr. Speaker, I will wait until a future time.

The SPEAKER. By special order of the House, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CHIPERFIELD] is recognized for 40 minutes.

Mr. YATES. Mr. Speaker, this is an important day, and the gentleman from Illinois is going to speak on an important subject. I make the point that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois makes the point that no quorum is present. The Chair will count. [After counting.] Ninety-two Members present; not a quorum.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House.

ABRAHAM LINCOLN

Mr. CHIPERFIELD. Mr. Speaker, many years have come and gone since the earth last saw the beloved form of the Great Emancipator.

Although now they almost equal in number the allotted span of the life of a man, not a single laurel that was placed upon his brow by the loving hands of a grateful people has been withered and not one has faded under the destroying hand of time.

The passage of the years has but added to the freshness and luster of those laurels, and his memory has become the more fixed and established, until to-day we again gather in reverence to do homage to the deeds and achievements of one of the Nation's greatest—Abraham Lincoln.

In the State from which I come, as well as in the other Commonwealths of the Nation, his greatness is not forgotten, nor are the deeds which he performed lost to remembrance, nor is their glory lessened; and though he has long since passed to the glorious company of the immortals, yet in truth he now lives and speaks wherever the thought of liberty finds lodgment in the mind of man.

As the gray twilight brings the day to a close on the broad prairies of Illinois mothers draw their little ones to their knees and tell in tones of affection o'er and o'er again the entrancing story of the life of this great man. And as the tale holds the youthful listeners spellbound, they do not dwell on the battles of years gone by, but speak they rather of his humble origin, of the devoted mother who guided his childish steps, of the struggling youth, the sturdy and determined manhood, and the just and loving heart that found vast expression in the beneficent life that gave to us a most precious legacy—the memory of one of the greatest and most loved men since the days of the Savior of the world—the memory of the humble rail splitter of the prairies of Illinois. [Applause.]

Others may speak of Lincoln the leader, the statesman, the President, but I speak this day of Lincoln the humane, of Lincoln the man, and the life that has endeared him to all liberty-loving citizens of the world.

From the humility of his origin, the hardships and privations of his youth, the sorrows and sympathies of his maturer years, the disappointments and triumphs of his life, out of the wisdom that he acquired in this harsh school of adversity came one who was recognized by the people of his time and class as a comrade, a companion, and a friend; one with whom even yet to-day we can walk in the same intimate, close, and tender association.

At this day we can not understand the severity of the struggles by which he rose or the bleak barrenness of his life which he describes as "the short and simple annals of the poor." In afteryears he could not bear to speak of those days, and so far as his words are concerned they are a sealed book.

In all the length and breadth of the land to-day there is not poverty such as he knew. It is not accurate for men to say that his life was the common lot of the sturdy pioneer of those days, for this is not correct.

Why, I can not tell, but so it is, that when a vast work in the affairs of nations is to be accomplished and a great man is required, the early scenes of his life are almost invariably laid amidst the humblest surroundings, and in homes where love has supplied the greater part of the needs of childhood days. It was so with Gideon, David, Luther, Garfield, Webster, Grant, Edison, and many others, and so it was, although to a much greater degree with Lincoln.

Reared in a cabin that was inferior to the shelter of the animals on the farm, housed in a structure that was for a long time without windows, doors, or a floor and that was not even enclosed on all four of its sides, here his early years were spent. The furnishings, meager and cruelly crude, were hardly worthy of the name; his resting place was a bed of leaves laid upon a rude support of poles. Here dwelt and developed the indomitable spirit of the lad, who, while his heart was ofttimes saddened, though not embittered, by the privations he experienced and the hardships he endured, suffered not his courage to fail.

Here it was that he learned the vast sympathy and the broad affection for his fellow man that a mansion or a palace does not seem to favor or create.

The church wisely reverences the humble cradle and abode of the Savior, and the American people find inspiration in the life of the youth who, as from a chrysalis, outgrows his humble surroundings and emerges triumphant with a character glorious and beautiful.

And so the lad of poverty triumphed until at his death the world stood silent and the monarchs of the earth bowed their heads in grief and laid their tributes upon his bier as he made his last journey, silent and still, by night and by day, through the unbroken ranks of sorrowing citizens, to the old home, in the heart of Illinois, where now his sacred dust reposes, a precious trust of the people of that State. [Applause.]

Between the humble home and the last imposing spectacle lay a life of love, devotion, and service. In it all is not found one day of selfish ease or idle self-indulgence. No anchorite ever lived more humbly or toiled more vigorously to attain the goal that was to be his.

To me it is a delight and a privilege to trace in imagination his triumphant, though weary, steps.

Love and service, attended with the highest devotion to duty, marked his course. His guide and counselor in those days of privation was a wonderful mother, whom he loved with all the devotion of his boyish heart, and of whom he said: "All that I am or ever hope to be, I owe to my angel mother." When the summons came to the rude hut and called her from earth away, it left the lad bereft and alone, and none could bring him comfort.

It was the first staggering blow to a life that already well knew sorrow.

Father and son with their own hands hewed out the rude casket, and winding her in her humble shroud, laid her away forever from the sight of man, to await that glorious day of awakening when instead of being one of the humblest of the earth, she would be welcomed to the life beyond as the heroic mother of one of the world's noblest. [Applause.]

Denoting the steadfastness of his devotion and purpose and the strength of his affection, the lad grieved day by day because no words of consolation and benediction had been spoken over the last resting place of his loved one, until learning that a man of God was at a distant point, months afterwards, he trudged his weary way over hill and dale and through the lonely forest that the mother might have Christian burial, and gladly brought to her grave a holy man to perform the last rites and there speak the words that brought comfort and peace to his heart.

As the Virgin Mother of God is remembered by the faithful, so is lovingly adored by the people of the land the mother of Abraham Lincoln; and in the vision of all mothers who toil and struggle in sacrifice, through poverty and hardship, that their children may start the world aright, she stands as a patron saint, a guiding light, and a glorious inspiration. [Applause.]

The struggles of his boyhood days and their biting poverty left a melancholy impress on his mind and soul.

They gave to him for his entire lifetime the sensitive heart of a child.

He could see no wrong done or hurt come to any living thing without himself being hurt.

He sorrowed with the sorrowful, and his tears fell with those who had been wounded and broken on the march of life.

His soul responded to the sufferings of the world.

Through his bitter experiences no man could better understand than he the fatherhood of God and the brotherhood of man, and this sympathetic comprehension animated and guided his every act.

In all the record of his life no mean deed is written, and in the story of his career, as orally preserved by tradition in the State from which I come, there does not remain even the suggestion that he was capable of a selfish or unworthy act.

As only a starved soul could yearn, he desired affection, and when this was given to him by Anne Rutledge it was returned with an ardor that was great. Many say that Anne Rutledge is a myth. I have visited her grave near the town of old Salem, where it is said that after her death Lincoln came often in sadness, and would not be consoled. It is repeated that at one of these times, he said that the true inscription for her resting place should be, "Here lies the body of Anne Rutledge and the heart of Abraham Lincoln."

Ofttimes he was oppressed with grief, and for days he would seem to be crushed by it. At such a time he once said:

I am now the most miserable man living. If what I feel were distributed among the whole human family, there would not be a cheerful face on earth. Whether I shall ever be better, I can not tell. I awfully forbode I shall not. To remain as I am is impossible; I must die or be better, it seems to me.

With his sensitive nature he sought the love of those with whom he was brought in contact. Their esteem and good opinion sustained, encouraged, and supported him. Without it he was cast down and disheartened. His reward—and the only one he sought—was the approval of his countrymen. And in later years the knowledge that he was at variance with a great section of the land caused him the most poignant grief.

It is worthy of much comment that although Lincoln—as he states—had the advantage of only six months of school, and no opportunity for what is sometimes called higher education, yet he was a man of great and profound knowledge.

Perhaps not widely versed in the details of the arts or sciences, yet he knew men. He knew their thoughts and minds and souls and the motives which animated them. He knew their strength and their weakness. He was brother and father to all mankind, and knew their sorrows and their trials. To them he could speak in simple words that touched their deepest sensibilities, and could play upon the chords of their emotion in language plain, it is true, but with words that lived and breathed; in language that stands to this day as an unparalleled example of literary style.

If you ask where he attained this power the answer, it seems to me, is easy to give. He and his forbears were born amid surroundings where life was stern and where each day was an actual struggle for existence. Under these conditions speech was as plain as the method of life. There they employed the good old Anglo-Saxon of a century past. They stripped from their meager vocabulary all effete and soft words and left remaining only those that were strong and vigorous, and of these they did not employ many.

The Bible was almost the only book, and its influence upon their speech was marked. Lincoln used words that were dynamic in their vigor. The addition of a syllable to a sentence was to him a matter of profligacy.

Each phrase was cut to the last degree, and thought was given expression in sentences that were strong, direct, and filled with meaning.

Lincoln used the monosyllable whenever possible, and his sentences ofttimes were almost entirely made up of these elementary words. When he spoke to the people in these simple terms they listened to him gladly, as they did in days of yore to the Man of Galilee, whose words were also plain and touched the hearts of all.

In this simple style Lincoln said:

I am not bound to win, but I am bound to be true. I am not bound to succeed, but I am bound to live up to what light I have. I must stand with anybody that stands right; stand with him while he is right and part with him when he is wrong.

And so, again, they were employed by him in making this prediction:

The mystic chords of memory stretching from every battlefield and every patriot grave to every living heart and hearthstone will yet swell the chorus of the Union when again touched as they will surely be by the better angels of our nature.

[Applause.]

And it was in these same words of common speech that he astonished and charmed the world when in their marvelous beauty he paid his tribute on the field of Gettysburg to the men of the land who had given their lives that the Nation might live forever. This famous speech consisted of about 300 words. Of these, 204 were words of one syllable.

In all of his preparation for his life work he was thorough and painstaking to the last degree. One day he was confronted with the word "demonstrate." Asking himself what it was to demonstrate, he went to his dictionary and saw that its meaning was "to make clear." He asked himself the question whether he could demonstrate and "make clear," and his answer was that he could not. Thereupon he laid aside the study of law, upon which he had commenced some months before, and took up the study of Euclid, and did not again return to the law until he had mastered the first five books of Euclid's great work.

So it was in all his acts.

Thoroughness was his rule and upon this solid basis did he build his life.

The path that Lincoln traversed in public life was not an easy one. Probably no man who ever attained great prominence has tasted as bitterly of defeat as did he.

In 1832 he was defeated for a seat in the Legislature of Illinois.

In 1848 he was defeated for renomination to Congress, to his great discouragement.

It then seemed to him, and so he said, that he believed that his public career was forever ended and that there was to be no further public service for him.

In 1849 he was a candidate for Commissioner of the General Land Office, but was defeated because Daniel Webster cast his influence in favor of another candidate.

In 1854 he was a candidate for United States Senator, but after a time withdrew in favor of Judge Trumbull.

In 1856 he was a candidate for Vice President, but was not named by the convention.

At that time he said:

I have the cottage at Springfield and about $8,000 in money. If they make me Vice President with Seward, as some say they will, I hope I shall be able to increase it to $20,000, and that is as much as any man ought to want.

In 1858 he was a candidate for the Senate of the United States, but was defeated by Judge Douglas, although he carried the popular vote of the State by 4,000.

His was a brave and indomitable heart.

He was not dismayed or crushed by these successive defeats, although his campaigns were made at a great sacrifice.

Lincoln was a comparatively poor man, and just what the sacrifices were can best be told in his own words to the Republican State committee of Illinois when he was told by them that there was no money to pay outstanding bills.

He wrote the committee as follows:

Yours of the 15th is just received. I wrote you the same day. As to the pecuniary matter, I am willing to pay according to my ability, but I am the poorest hand living to get others to pay. I have been on expense so long without earning anything that I am absolutely without money now for even household purposes. Still, if you can put up $250 for me toward discharging the debt of the committee, I will allow it when you and I settle the private matter between us. This, with what I have already paid, and with an outstanding note of mine, will exceed my subscription of $500. This, too, is exclusive of my ordinary expenses during the campaign, all which, being added to my loss of time and business, bears pretty heavily on one no better off in world's goods than I; but, as I had the post of honor, it is not for me to be overnice. You are feeling badly, "And this, too, shall pass away, never fear."

And after the long struggle came the great victory and he sat in the seat of the mighty.

But this did not change a single fiber of his kindly nature. The mountain crest meant no more to him than the lowly valley.

When power came and greatness was his he wore his honors modestly, without arrogance or ostentation, and humility and kindness marked his course.

He was to the Nation Father Abraham, and with meekness and might, affection and care he led his children through the valley of the shadow, safely into the fold of peace and tranquillity. [Applause.]

No greater tribute can be paid to the wisdom and worth of the opinion of Lincoln than is paid to-day by those who use him and his words as the final and supreme argument in favor of some proposed plan or movement.

It is demonstration to the minds of many when it can be said, "Lincoln favored these things."

But while the tribute is great the name of Lincoln is not always worthily employed.

Those who seek to destroy and break down the vital principles of our Government do not hesitate to invoke his name as an aid in the accomplishment of that purpose.

By the frenzied orator of the curb, who inveighs against all government, his auditors are told that Lincoln stood for absolute freedom of thought and action and that he had no regard for the limitations of law.

They are not told, however, that Lincoln stood for freedom of speech and action only under the Constitution and the law. [Applause.] They are not told that in speaking of this freedom of speech he said:

> Yes, we will speak for freedom and against slavery as long as the Constitution of our country guarantees free speech, until everywhere in this wide land the sun shall shine and the rain shall fall and the winds shall blow upon no man who goes forth to unrequited toil.

The things for which he stood and which he attempted to do were in the name of the Constitution, and to this instrument, as he construed it, he was wholly devoted.

The reckless and harebrained experiment in government possessed no attraction for him, nor was he inclined to adopt a plan merely because it was new and untried, but going hand in hand with his conservatism was the ever-present desire to so adapt the Constitution that it would respond to the changing needs and requirements of the people. [Applause.]

While regarding with reverence the precedents of the past, he also sought to be acutely conscious of, and responsive to, the economic demands and needs of the present.

As he was intensely human in all his aspects of life, so did he make a sympathetic and human interpretation of the Constitution, where the rights of men were involved, which, while not always strict or entirely logical, still made for the uplifting and the welfare of the people of the land.

With such a construction of the Constitution of the United States, by those in power, the people of the Nation will not quarrel. It is radical changes in our forms of government, not authorized by the Constitution, that will be met with condemnation.

Those who find comfort in the denial of a God or of a Supreme Being frequently claim Lincoln as one who shared their views and approved their lack of belief.

No greater or more foul slander could be uttered against this man.

Lincoln walked hand in hand with God for many years before his death, and there is no act of his life that warrants the claims so advanced against him.

It may be that he could not define a particular creed that entirely and closely fitted his views, but his steadfast belief in a God and His divine power to guide and shape the affairs of men was touching.

There is hardly an utterance of Lincoln, that has been preserved that does not speak of this belief and faith.

On one occasion, early in life, when his father was about to pass away, Lincoln wrote this letter:

> I sincerely hope father may recover his health, but in all events tell him to remember to call upon and confide in our great and good and merciful Maker, who will not turn away from him in any extremity. He notes the fall of a sparrow and numbers the hairs of our heads, and He will not forget the dying man who puts his trust in Him. Say to him that if we could meet now it is doubtful whether it would be more painful than pleasant, but that if it be his lot to go now, he will soon have a joyous meeting with many loved ones gone before, and where the rest of us, through the help of God, hope ere long to join them.

His state papers are filled with appeals to God and statements of his belief in a Supreme Being, and of his reliance upon His aid and assistance.

His trusting faith was like that of a little child who confidingly puts his hand in that of a loving father and walks the path with a sublime trust and without fear.

One can not fail to be impressed with the startling fact that the entire achievement of the life of Abraham Lincoln, that has caused the generations to remember him, was accomplished and performed in barely 1,500 days.

If, from his life, were taken the actions and deeds embraced in those days his name would barely be known outside of the counties of Illinois where his activities had been.

When defeated for the Senate by Douglas, it seemed to the doubting many that his career was done—but the defeats of the past were, to him, only the foundations on which he builded his future triumph.

His trials and struggles and sorrows had refined his soul until the dross was gone, and out of his bitter experience came forth a man—apparently called of God—to guide the people of the land, both North and South, out of the horrors of war to the place where, rededicated by the blood of a hundred fields, they stood a united and invincible people. [Applause.]

One lesson taught by Lincoln that may be helpful in the present day was his unfaltering determination to stand steadfast before the nations of the world for the rights of America.

Although opposed by the bravest of the brave at home, he did not fail to speak courageously for the dignity of the country when it was assailed from abroad and in the overwhelming crisis of those days, he spoke in the name of our Nation for the preservation and recognition of its fundamental rights.

To-day we are in the midst of a great national crisis and confronted with and threatened by a world cataclysm which all pray may be averted.

It will be averted whenever the people of the Nation are sufficiently impressed with the importance of and need for united action.

The poet has told in inspiring lines of the response that the people of the land will make to such a situation, and it was no more true when penned than it is to-day.

This whole Nation will respond either in time of peace or time of war, by sacrifice and endeavor or by arms, and bear any hardship that may be imposed, no matter how severe, whenever danger assails the Republic. [Applause.]

In time of the Nation's need and peril truly it can be said:

> Up the hillside, down the glen,
> Rouse the sleeping citizen:
> Summon out the might of men:
>
> Like a lion growling low,
> Like a night storm rising slow,
> Like the tread of unseen foe.
> It is coming—it is nigh:
> Stand your homes and altars by;
> On your own free thresholds die.
> Clang the bells in all your spires;
> On the gray hills of your sires
> Fling to heaven your signal fires.
> O for God and duty stand,
> Heart to heart and hand to hand,
> Round the old graves of the land.
> Whoso shrinks or falters now,
> Whoso to the yoke would bow,
> Brand the craven on his brow.
> Freedom's soil hath only place
> For a free and fearless race—
> None for traitors false and base.
>
> Perish party, perish clan:
> Strike together while ye can,
> Like the arm of one strong man.

[Applause.]

How marvelously like the ministry of the Savior of the World were the beneficent years of this great leader of men.

How like the passion of the Son of God was the martyrdom which he suffered, that all men might be free, and better yet be free with the Nation united.

For him the zenith of his career had been reached, and, like Moses, he stood upon the height and viewed the land regenerated, but which he might not enter—and then, on Good Friday, the day when the Christian world was sorrowfully observing the crucifixion of the Christ, God took him, even though the evening of his life had not yet come, for his task was done.

Yea, he was taken, if it can be so said of the death of the clay that formed his body, but there was left the undying spirit of this great man, to lead and protect the people of this Nation, by the wisdom he displayed, for many generations to come.

And then came ungrudgingly the belated acknowledgment of his greatness.

By none was it more dramatically confessed than by the British publication Punch, the magazine that for years had sneered at Lincoln and had never missed an opportunity to hurl at him the poisoned barb of ridicule.

But in the presence of death the voice of malice was silenced and its tribute to the worth of Mr. Lincoln will long endure. It then said:

You lay a wreath on murdered Lincoln's bier,
You, who, with mocking pencil wont to trace
Broad, for the self-complacent sneer,
His length of shambling limb, his furrowed face.

His gaunt, gnarled hands, his unkempt, brisling hair,
His garb uncouth, his bearing ill at ease,
His lack of all we prize as debonair,
Of power or will to shine, of art to please.

You, whose smart pen backed up the pencil's laugh,
Judging each step as though the way were plain;
Reckless, so it could point its paragraph
Of chief's perplexity, or people's pain.

Beside this corpse, that bears for winding sheet
The Stars and Stripes he lived to rear anew,
Between the mourners at his head and feet,
Say, scurril jester, is there room for you?

Yes, he had lived to shame me from my sneer,
To lame my pencil and confute my pen—
To make me own this hind of princes peer,
This rail splitter, as true-born king of men.

My shallow judgment I had learned to rue,
Noting how to occasion's height he rose,
How his quaint wit made home truth seem more true,
How iron-like, his temper grew by blows.

How humble, yet how hopeful he could be;
How in good fortune and in ill the same;
Nor bitter in success, nor boastful he,
Thirsty for gold nor feverish for fame.

He went about his work—such work as few
Ever had laid on head, and heart, and hand—
As one who knows, where there's a task to do,
Man's honest will must Heaven's good grace command.

Who trusts the strength will with the burden grow,
That God makes instruments to work His will,
If but that will we can arrive to know,
Nor tamper with the weights of good and ill.

[Applause.]

Great men have come and gone since Lincoln fell, and many have attained high places in the Nation, but seldom has one, even when his power was the greatest, attained the wonderful influence over the people of the land that has been manifested, and still continues to be manifested until this day, by the memory of Abraham Lincoln.

That influence has guided the Nation when the hand of living man has faltered, for being dead, yet he speaketh to the souls of men with power and conviction.

And so, to-day, as a Representative of the State of Illinois, I pay a humble tribute to the life and work of her great son.

Into his hands the people gave all that was best and dearest. To him they intrusted the sacred honor of the Nation, and never did he fail that trust. In his death they honor him and preserve his memory.

In the hall of representatives at Springfield only two portraits are found.

On the one hand is that of Douglas, who in the hour of stress, clasped hands with his old-time political opponent and who held up the arms of Lincoln as Aaron did those of his leader of old.

The place of Douglas is secure in the affections of the people of the Prairie State.

From the other side of the hall looks down the towering form of Abraham Lincoln, and there the people of the State come and stand with tearful eyes, gazing into the kindly face of this great man, and as they depart they take away an inspiration to discharge the duties of citizenship better and more fully.

Our State has taken his ashes, his fame, and his memory to its heart.

One it will guard and the others it will proclaim until the Father of Waters no longer runs to the sea and until time is no more.

Not without thy wondrous story,
Illinois, Illinois,
Can be writ the Nation's glory,
Illinois, Illinois,
On the record of thy years,
Abram Lincoln's name appears,
Grant and Logan and our tears,
Illinois.

In one of the most beautiful parks, in the city of Chicago, stands a wonderful monument, erected to commemorate the life of this, one of the world's greatest men.

It is builded beside the vast inland sea, whose ceaseless surf sounds a requiem by night and by day.

The first rays of the rising sun rest upon it in rosy salutation, and here again they pause in benediction ere the night closes down.

To this spot the people come as they might to a shrine of freedom.

Here they pause and linger.

Here gather the poor of whom Lincoln said:

God must have loved them or else He would not have made so many of them.

At the base of the statue little children play.

Here kings and princes and rulers have sent their wreaths and floral tributes to be laid at the feet of the imposing figure that, motionless and silent, ever looks toward the great city.

In loving remembrance this memorial has been builded by the people of Illinois to honor its first citizen, Abraham Lincoln, the martyred President.

On its base, chiseled deep into the lasting granite, is one of the greatest sentences in the English language and from its perusal we can gain the secret of the power and see the faith that animated Lincoln and gave him the courage to perform his task.

In that sentence may be found a motto by which any man can live, and that can be adopted by a nation as its rule of action in its hour of need.

These are his words, noble and courageous:

Let us have faith to believe that right makes might, and firm in that conviction let us to the end dare to do our duty as God gives us to see it.

Words of mine can add nothing to the veneration in which this wonderful character is held by the people of the land, both North and South.

He is loved and revered and his fame grows more secure as the generations pass.

I can not refrain, however, from adding as a far greater tribute than any I can pay one which was penned of Lincoln by a sweet singer.

It seems to me that it is a sublime epitomization of the character and the life of this man:

The color of the ground was in him, the red earth;
The tang and odor of the primal things—
The rectitude and patience of the rocks;
The gladness of the wind that shakes the corn;
The courage of the bird that dares the sea;
The justice of the rain that loves all leaves;
The pity of the snow that hides all scars;
The loving kindness of the wayside well;
The tolerance and equity of light that gives as freely to
The shrinking weed as to the great oak flaring to the wind—
The grave's low hill as to the Matterhorn,
That shoulders out the sky.

And so he came
From prairie cabin to the Capitol,
One fair ideal led our chieftain on.
Furthermore, he burned to do his deed
With the fine stroke and gesture of a king;
He built the rail pile as he built the State,
Pouring his splendid strength through every blow,
The conscience of him testing every stroke,
To make his deed the measure of a man.

So came the captain, with his mighty heart,
And when the step of earthquake shook the house,
Wrenching the rafters from their ancient hold,
He held the ridge pole up and spiked again
The rafters of the home. He held his place—
Held the long purpose like a growing tree—
Held on through blame and faltered not at praise,
And when he fell in whirlwind he went down
As when a kingly cedar, green with boughs,
Goes down with a great shout upon the hills
And leaves a lonesome place against the sky.

[Prolonged applause, the Members rising.]

WHEAT DISTRIBUTION

Mr. POLK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. POLK. Mr. Speaker, I am sure we have all enjoyed the brilliant address to which we have just listened. I rise at this time, solely of my own volition, to call the attention of the House and of the country to a circumstance which occurred on last Monday morning in the committee of which I happen to be a member. I refer to the concerted action of all of the Republican members of the House Committee on Agriculture, who voted as a block to refuse to permit the bill designated as Senate Joint Resolution 60, providing for the distribution of wheat owned by the Government to the American National Red Cross and to other agencies for the relief of the hungry people of America, to come before the House for consideration.

This is a worthy measure, designed to alleviate in some small degree the suffering which is acute in many parts of our country. The Government owns this wheat; it has been paid for from taxes levied either directly or indirectly on practically every man, woman, and child in this country. This wheat is costing the taxpayers hundreds of thousands of dollars annually in storage and other fixed charges. It will probably deteriorate if held over a considerable period of time; it has a depressing effect on the market for wheat both at home and abroad, and practically all fair-minded and unbiased authorities agree that everybody would be better off if this huge supply of wheat hoarded by the Grain Stabilization Corporation could be disposed of in some profitable way. The way to dispose of some of this wheat exists right at our hands. Hungry men are walking the streets of every city in our land; women and children are huddled in hovels and shacks praying for food to keep body and soul together. Efficient agencies for relieving distress are ready and willing to use this wheat for the purpose for which it was grown, and still under the rules of this House this meritorious legislation can be blocked.

Mr. Speaker, in order to bring the attention of the House to this problem I hope petitions may be prepared requesting the Speaker to direct that the wheat distribution bill shall be immediately reported to this body for consideration.

This is a time which demands action—not words. While we sit idly by hunger stalks through the land. Little children are going to school undernourished; relief organizations are rapidly depleting their resources for providing the necessaries of life. In my district the Red Cross, the American Legion and the American Legion Auxiliary, parent-teachers' associations, Kiwanis Clubs, Rotary and Lions' Clubs, and many other fraternal and social-relief organizations are functioning as best they can, but the private funds they have are rapidly diminishing. In our cities "community chest" funds are in many instances inadequate to the demands being placed upon them. Much of this relief work, especially in the country and small towns and cities, falls upon people already heavily burdened by taxation; people who are not in position financially to bear this added burden of providing food and clothing for those in need.

The proposed use of the wheat now owned by the Government by the various relief organizations of the country, through the National Red Cross, will lift a heavy burden from the shoulders of our public-spirited men and women who are engaged in relief work.

Dr. Robert E. Brown, of the Graduate School of Oberlin College, Oberlin, Ohio, has evolved a plan whereby, with the use of ground wheat or wheat meal—coarse and fine—ground in the simplest kind of a grinder, as the basic element, he is able to furnish meals at a cost as low as 3 cents per person.

Now is the time for the Government to use some of its resources for the needy and for us to apply in a practical way the doctrine laid down by Thomas Jefferson over a hundred and fifty years ago, that human rights are more precious than property rights. This Congress only recently appropriated $2,000,000,000 to help the financial and business interests of the country through the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, but unless some extraordinary action is taken and this meritorious bill, which has been killed in committee, is called up by the Speaker at the request of petitions signed by a sufficient number of Members, you will have gone on record as unwilling to grant grain for food for the hungry.

Mr. POLK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks by inserting a short editorial from the Cleveland Plain Dealer of February 9, 1932.

Mr. KNUTSON. Mr. Speaker, I object.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Ohio desire to extend his own remarks?

Mr. POLK. I do.

Mr. KNUTSON. Mr. Speaker, I have no objection to the gentleman extending his own remarks, but I object to the editorial.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. SNOW. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for two minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Maine?

There was no objection.

Mr. SNOW. Mr. Speaker, I fully realize that every Member of this House is entitled to his own opinion, but I consider it a very cheap piece of business for any member of a committee to rise here and criticize the motives of other members of that committee for voting as they conscientiously thought was right way to vote on the measure which the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. POLK] has just referred to. [Applause.] Gentlemen, abuse is no argument. Speaking for the 10 Republican members of the committee and, I might add, for 4 distinguished Democratic members of that committee [applause], I want to say that we voted in the way we thought was the right way, and nothing else, the opinion of the gentleman from Ohio to the contrary notwithstanding.

As one member of that committee I resent the remarks which the gentleman from Ohio has made, and I say that I consider them decidedly unfair. I furthermore say to you that the evidence as presented to our committee, in the opinion of some of us at least, was not sufficient to warrant a favorable vote for the bill and it was for that reason and that reason only that we 14 members voted against the bill. [Applause.]

COMMENCEMENT OF TERMS OF PRESIDENT, VICE PRESIDENT, MEMBERS OF CONGRESS, ETC.

Mr. POU. Mr. Speaker, I call up House Resolution 133.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina calls up a resolution, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

House Resolution 133

Resolved, That immediately upon the adoption of this resolution it shall be in order to move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of Senate Joint Resolution 14, proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States fixing the commencement of the terms of President and Vice President and Members of Congress and fixing the time of the assembling of Congress.

That after general debate, which shall be confined to the joint resolution and shall continue not to exceed three hours, to be equally divided and controlled by the chairman and ranking minority member of the Committee on Election of President, Vice President, and Representatives in Congress, the Senate joint resolution shall be read for amendment under the 5-minute rule. At the conclusion of the reading of the joint resolution for amendment the committee shall rise and report the same to the House with such amendments as may have been adopted, and the previous question shall be considered as ordered on the resolution and the amendment thereto to final passage without intervening motion except one motion to recommit.

Mr. POU. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent, and I think my colleague on the other side will not object, that on page 2, in line 4, after the word "rule," the following amendment be incorporated: "for the purpose of amendment the House committee substitute shall be considered as an original bill."

Mr. MICHENER. That is satisfactory to this side, Mr. Speaker, as far as the committee is concerned.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina offers an amendment to the resolution, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. POU: Page 2, line 4, after the word "rule," insert the words "for the purpose of amendment the House committee substitute shall be considered as an original bill."

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from North Carolina.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. Speaker, I wish to make inquiry as to the effect of the amendment.

Mr. POU. It simply makes the House committee substitute as the original resolution.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. LEWIS. Would amendments be admissible under the amendment that would not be admissible were the amendment not adopted?

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands the proposed amendment to the rule gives greater liberality in the offering of amendments in the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, as I understand, the House committee struck out all of the Senate bill after the enacting clause, and the purpose of the amendment is to throw open the House resolution to amendments under the general rules of the House.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from North Carolina.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. POU. Mr. Speaker, this special rule from the Committee on Rules provides for the consideration of Senate Joint Resolution 14, proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States fixing the time of the assembling of Congress, and so forth.

It is known throughout the country, I believe, as the so-called "lame duck" amendment to the Constitution.

Mr. Speaker, this is a subject that has been considered by the House and the Senate for a number of years. The rule provides for three hours of general debate, one half to be controlled by the chairman of the committee and one half by the ranking minority member. As this proposed amendment has been discussed so much and as I see no necessity for any further observations as to the rule, which provides for the consideration of the joint resolution, I shall have nothing further to say, and reserve the remainder of my time.

Mr. MICHENER. Mr. Speaker, may I say that our understanding was that we would not take much time on the rule unless there was great demand for time. General debate under the rule is exceedingly short, being but three hours. I might say to the gentleman that we have a great demand for time on this side. The ranking member of the legislative committee advises me that he has such a demand for time that he has not even been able to take care of all the members of the committee.

Mr. POU. How much time does the gentleman require?

Mr. MICHENER. The usual 30 minutes.

Mr. CELLER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MICHENER. Yes.

Mr. CELLER. I have been trying to get some time on the resolution, and other Members on this side have been trying to do the same thing. While I will no doubt be able to get time, why could it not be arranged that the time used in discussing the rule be added to the time for general debate on the resolution?

Mr. POU. It is not considered entirely proper to discuss the merits of a resolution or bill under the rule itself, but it has been done ever since I have been a Member of this body. Mr. Speaker, I yield the gentleman from Michigan one-half hour, to be in turn used as he may see fit.

Mr. MICHENER. Mr. Speaker, as a member of the Rules Committee, in February, 1931, in the Seventy-first Congress, I presented a similar rule, which made the proposed constitutional amendment in order at that time, and expressed my views as to the necessity for the amendment. This proposal has passed the Senate six or seven times and was approved by the House by more than a two-thirds vote about a year ago, but died in conference. The Gifford resolution, as it passed the House, was in all material respects the same as the resolution which we are here to consider, with two exceptions: First, the present resolution places no limit on the length of either session of Congress. Second, section 6 of the Gifford resolution is not embodied in the present resolution. That section reads thus:

This article shall be inoperative unless it shall have been ratified as an amendment to the Constitution by the legislatures of three-fourths of the States within seven years from the date of the submission hereof to the States by the Congress, and the act of ratification shall be by legislatures the entire membership of at least one branch of which shall have been elected subsequent to such date of submission.

We are familiar with the so-called Longworth amendment, which passed in the last session and which limited the short session of Congress to June 4, as I recall. This amendment did not fix by Constitution an unchangeable date for the termination of the second session but did provide that June 4 should end the second session unless the Congress by legislation determined otherwise. The reasons for this change are so fully set forth in the debates in the last session that repetition is unnecessary. I am advised that the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WARREN] will offer this amendment when the resolution is being read for amendment, and I bespeak for his amendment the favorable consideration of the House. Previous to the submission of the eighteenth amendment Congress had never placed a limitation upon the time in which the legislatures of the several States might ratify an amendment. As a result several amendments to the Constitution have been passed by Congress on which no action has ever been taken by the required number of States, yet these amendments are in existence, have vitality, and would become a part of the fundamental law of the land if a sufficient number of the States should proceed to ratify them. Indeed, some of these amendments are almost as old as the Constitution itself—for instance, amendments proposed in 1789, 1810, 1861, and 1924 have not been ratified by the States, and there are possibly others which I do not now recall. The Supreme Court of the United States has held that the Congress has the power to place a reasonable limitation upon the time in which the States have to ratify an amendment, and seven years has been held a reasonable time. It seems to me that no possible objection can be had to a provision of this kind.

Section 6, above referred to, contains a new feature in that it provides that at least one body of the State legislature must be elected by the people after the submission of the constitutional amendment and before its consideration by the State legislature. I favor submitting this constitutional amendment, and I shall vote for the amendment, and I make these few suggestions merely for the purpose of perfecting the proposal.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MICHENER. Yes.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. What constitutional justification has the gentleman for the second provision in his amendment, namely, that one body of the legislature be elected after the submission of the amendment?

Mr. MICHENER. The gentleman has no ruling on the constitutional authority, because the matter has never been submitted, but he has just the same justification that those who submitted the seven years' provision in the first place had. That very question was argued very thoroughly in the Congress—in the House and in the Senate—and it was argued that the Constitution provided the way and that the Congress could not, by legislation, change that way. The Supreme Court has sustained the 7-year proposition, and I feel just as confident that the Supreme Court, for the same reasons, would sustain this proposition.

I hope these two amendments will be accepted, and when accepted, that the resolution will pass. However, in order that I may not be misunderstood, I repeat that I favor the resolution. Personally I shall vote for the resolution without the amendments, but it is much better, in my judgment, with the amendments.

Mr. CELLER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MICHENER. For a short question; yes.

Mr. CELLER. Do I understand the gentleman to say that the Supreme Court might decide that the legislatures of the various States would have to ratify within seven years even if there were no such express provision in the resolution?

Mr. MICHENER. No; what the gentleman said was that the Supreme Court has decided that Congress may provide a time in which the States must act and that seven years is a reasonable time, and it is the judgment of the gentleman speaking that the Supreme Court would also ratify the provision that at least one body of the State legislature must be elected by the people before the ratification is effective by the State legislature.

Mr. CELLER. Suppose we adopt this resolution which, I understand, carries no limitation as to seven years or any other time, would the Supreme Court, in passing upon this provision at some subsequent time, permit the ratification if it took 20 years, for instance?

Mr. MICHENER. If the gentleman had been listening to the earlier part of my remarks he would realize I stated that there were to-day amendments floating about the country which were submitted 100 years ago, which might, theoretically, become a part of the Constitution to-day if certain States which had not acted should act upon the amendments now; and we want to avoid anything of that kind.

I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD].

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I compliment the Committee on Rules in affording at so early a date in the session of the Congress an opportunity to the House to vote on this resolution. On six or seven different occasions the Senate of the United States has passed this resolution, forwarded it to the House, and it was either buried in committee or, as in the last Congress, left dangling as a waif in the committee room or somewhere else for more than a year after it had passed the Senate. It was brought up for consideration in the House late in the closing days of the Congress, an amendment was added, which was a rather material amendment, the resolution as amended passed, but the lateness of the session did not give time for the Senate to pass upon the question carried in the amendment.

Whether the resolution is passed in toto as it has been presented by the committee or is amended in the particulars suggested by the gentleman from Michigan, nevertheless we can expect that some definitive action will be taken this session upon this resolution, which has been so greatly demanded by the American people.

I do not join with the distinguished gentleman from Michigan in the fear that this proposed amendment will join the 100 amendments that have been proposed since the organization of the Government that have never been ratified by the legislatures of a sufficient number of the States and are now dangling in the limbo of the past for the very reason that this is a live amendment about which the people of the country are much concerned and which the legislatures are waiting for an opportunity to ratify.

In no government on the face of the earth do we find the condition where a legislative body, after it has been discredited by the people, is granted the opportunity to continue to legislate. I shall not enter into an academic discussion as to how it came about that we had a hold-over session to pass legislation after the election, but the fact is that prior to 1821 there were 18 distinct legislative proposals of various Congresses providing a different assembling date than the first Monday of December, and 10 of these 18 were for the first Monday in November.

The resolution that we have here before us contains nothing that makes it mandatory that Congress shall assemble on the 4th day of January of each year in even-numbered and odd-numbered years. It leaves it to the Congress to fix some different date, and I am hopeful that when this amendment is ratified by the legislatures of a sufficient number of the States that instead of our convening in the even-numbered years on the 4th day of January we will convene on the first Monday of November prior thereto, so as to make the long session meet on the first Monday of November in the odd-numbered year prior to the congressional or presidential election, and run along prior to the assembling of the national conventions.

I think the proposal of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. MICHENER] that was voted on so very positively in the last Congress and which will be submitted here for a vote to-day, prescribing some day in June, perhaps, when the Congress should mandatorily come to an end, should be adopted; that is, in the year when we have our presidential elections or our congressional elections and conventions.

Even the adoption of this amendment would not prevent the Congress, or even that Congress, from deciding on a different date of that same year if the exigency of the case would require it; but it would prevent perhaps some obstreperous Members who bask in the sunlight of publicity and whose homes are here more than in their respective States holding up the Congress when the membership of the House overwhelmingly would like to get back to their districts so as to look after their own election and give an accounting to the electorate of what they had done and how they had voted.

Neither is the power vested in the President contravened from summoning the Congress in emergent session if required.

Section 3 of the proposed resolution takes care of the hiatus that has happened only once in 140 years, where there was not a majority of the electoral votes for any one candidate for the Presidency. That was in 1825. The four respective candidates for President—William H. Crawford, of Georgia; Henry Clay, of Kentucky; Andrew Jackson, of Tennessee; and John Quincy Adams, of Massachusetts—each lacked having a majority of the electors.

John Quincy Adams and Henry Clay between them did not have a majority vote, but Andrew Jackson and William H. Crawford between them had a majority, and yet the House, under the method prescribed by Article XII of the amendments, voted to elect John Quincy Adams.

This provision takes care of the hiatus in case the President elect should die after he is elected, or in case there should be no Vice President to take the office, as it gives Congress the right to pass legislation as to who, under the circumstances, would succeed to the office.

The resolution has been carefully considered by the committees of the House and the Senate. In this we are but echoing the advance thought of the world and of the country to discontinue, to put a stop for all time to these lame-duck sessions of Congress, after the people have voted out certain Members and, perhaps, have turned the control over to the opposition party.

I well remember—and the older Members will remember—that fateful day, March 4, 1911, when the Republicans, after having been in control of all branches of the Government for 16 years and were then losing control of the House, with Speaker Cannon in the chair, at the hour of 11.15, tried to put through the House under whip and spur the Tariff Commission act. The Democrats were solidly arrayed against that outrageous legislative coup. Feeling ran high. The House was in wild disorder. One Democratic Member stood here in the well with a knife in his hand, threatening the Speaker if he would recognize Members to pass the resolution.

The Democrats were right—the Republicans had been discredited. By what constitutional right could a legislative body, after it had been renounced by the electorate, assume to legislate, especially on a partisan matter? Why should any Congress, in a hold-over session, be permitted to pass appropriation bills or any kind of legislation in the few months of the hold-over session, especially where the membership has changed? This archaic system is a legislative anachronism that has been tolerated but not justified. The fundamental principle of legislative accountability to the electorate is violated. The renounced Members have had loosened the ties of responsibility in their votes.

I do not claim that all defeated Representatives are chary of their high responsibility, but oftentimes, I regret to say, many have been.

So I urge the removal of this legislative abnormality so that trust in our Congress will not be impaired, or even questioned, by any part of the electorate.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. POU. Mr. Speaker, how much time have I used?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has used four minutes.

Mr. POU. I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. GREENWOOD].

Mr. GREENWOOD. Mr. Speaker, we have before us for consideration a constitutional amendment, and I shall speak to the merits of the amendment rather than the rule, which I understand has been customary.

This is an amendment that has been up several times for our consideration, and of which I have confidence in its merits and believe in its great importance to the machinery of our Federal Government.

The adoption of this amendment is not fundamental, in that it goes to any traditional principles of our Government. It is not a change in the fundamental principle or the theory of our Government, but goes merely to the mechanics of procedure in Congress.

The present method was formulated 140 years ago, when we were without railroads, without telegraph lines, without airplanes, or any of the present methods of transportation or communication. No doubt it was considered adequate for that day in which our forefathers lived when they formulated the Constitution, but we are living in a different age. We are living in an age of speed. We are living in an age when we attempt to do things in a more efficient manner, when time is of great importance. It seems to me that it is a great travesty to have a Congress elected in November that shall enter on the pay roll on the 4th of the following March and not be called to their official duties until 13 months after they are elected. I submit it is impractical and that it is unscientific; that it is not calculated to produce the best methods of government or of legislation. So it is to eliminate that session of the old Congress after the election has been held, the commonly called "lame-duck" session, that this amendment is proposed.

Our Republic has always been heralded as a government that is representative in its character. The only part that the people play in the machinery of government is at the ballot box. It is there that they hold check and balance upon the administration and upon the legislative program and the official activities of their officers. If that is a fundamental principle, as we all concede, then a mandate that is issued in the early part of November should be carried into effect as soon as possible after the election has been held. The old method under which we are now operating nullifies that principle of government that the people speak authoritatively at the ballot box. It allows men, after they have been repudiated at the polls, to come back and for a period of three months legislate for the people. Not only that, although it has rarely been the circumstance, nevertheless, a President might have to be elected by the House of Representatives, as has been necessary in times past. Shall we say it meets our ideas of democracy that a Congress that has been repudiated at the polls in November shall meet here the following year, and if a President has not been elected in that election, that that old Congress which met defeat at the polls shall be called into session to elect a President of the United States? I think it is impractical, that it is unscientific, and that it is undemocratic, and I think in this modern day it might be considered as un-American. No Congress, commissioned in November, should be compelled to remain at home for 13 months before it assumes its official duties.

I want to make this House of Representatives responsible to the people of the United States who commission it.

There is one amendment that has been offered to this resolution in times past that probably will be offered again, and that is that the second session of the Congress shall be limited by the Constitution. I think we have noticed in our experience of times past that the short session of Congress is very often filled with confusion. It is that barrier of the 4th day of March that stands there, fixed by law as the time when Congress must adjourn, that offers that opportunity for some person who is overenthusiastic for some personal measure to assume the responsibility of thwarting the legislative will of Congress by means of filibuster. I do not believe the machinery of government should be such as to allow a stubborn minority of one Member to defeat the will of the majority. It is contrary to my ideas of representative government, controlled by the majority, that there should be any opportunity offered, under the machinery of the management of this House or of Congress, that will permit one man's will to defeat the will of the majority.

The short sessions of Congress very often end in confusion, and we go back to our constituency in humiliation that matters of supreme importance in legislation, and even appropriation bills, have been defeated by the will of one man or a small minority, because that barrier was fixed at which adjournment should be had, absolutely.

Our Government has grown to the place where the transaction of one year's business is just as important as another. I never could see the practical side; I never could see the advantage of having a long session of Congress followed by a short session. Appropriations must be more or less uniformly made, and the activities of all departments are practically the same one with another. The duties of Congress are the same one year with another. I can not see why one session of Congress should go on until a joint resolution of both Houses to adjourn has been agreed to, while the short session is absolutely closed by limitation of law.

This is campaign year. We are gathered in the long session of Congress. We have certain business to transact and certain tasks to perform; but who will say that when that task is finished both Houses will not be willing to adjourn and that we will adjourn as we always have, in plenty of time to transact the business, politically speaking, that shall confront us in the campaign?

It has been said that self-preservation is the first law of nature. That is true in politics as it is true in nature. Each Congress may be trusted to finish its business. Congress should proceed each year until its task is finished, and it should not have a barrier standing there, fixed by law, as the goal toward which some one who desires to filibuster and thwart the will of the majority shall use as an instrumentality for his own individual desires.

I say it is impractical to have a short session and a long session of Congress when the business of the country is uniform from year to year. Furthermore, I am not one who is willing to believe that there should be written into the Constitution of the United States a provision that is based upon political expediency. When we place a limitation on the second session of Congress, on the theory that it is campaign year, we are writing the Constitution of the United States on that theory of political expediency instead of the welfare of the country. Let us attend to business first and politics will take care of itself.

Mr. MICHENER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GREENWOOD. I yield.

Mr. MICHENER. I do not want to be understood as stating that I was proposing this amendment because it was campaign year. I want it understood that there must be a limitation at some time, even though it be the end of the year, and that so far as filibustering is concerned, that is just as effective at the end of a long session as it is at the end of a short session.

Mr. GREENWOOD. My remarks were not directed at anything the gentleman from Michigan said.

Mr. POU. Mr. Speaker, I yield the gentleman one additional minute.

Mr. GREENWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I have just this further observation to make, that we can trust both branches of the Congress to close the session in the second year just the same as they are now called upon to close it in the first year. The business of the country is uniform, so that it is as important to have a long session in the second year as in the first year. It is important that the Congress should take care of all its tasks before closing a session rather than to have the closing date fixed by law, so that it will be absolute. If the session in the second year is not arbitrarily closed by law, then the Congress can finish all the tasks they have to perform.

Let us place no limitation in the Constitution, but leave that to the discretion of each Congress to adjourn when the legislative program is finished.

Mr. POU. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WARREN].

Mr. WARREN. Mr. Speaker, as much as I would like to have the opportunity to do so, I feel physically unable to-day to discuss this resolution. I have well-settled convictions on this subject, and have expressed them on every occasion that this resolution has been under consideration. I think we have made a mountain out of a molehill on the whole matter. I realize the force of the argument that a defeated or a discredited Congress should not be permitted to function, and I am in sympathy with that part of the resolution, although I think we can accomplish by statute all we are now seeking to accomplish by an amendment of the Constitution. I do feel, however, very keenly against a wide-open and a perpetual session of Congress. Those of us who were here in the last session will remember that the late distinguished Speaker of this House left the chair for the second time during his incumbency, took the floor, and offered an amendment to place a limitation of four months on the second session of Congress. I merely rise at this time to give notice that at the proper time I shall offer that same amendment, which was largely supported on both sides of the House, and which was adopted by 81 majority last February. I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Speaker, that I may extend my remarks by inserting in the RECORD the roll call last February on the so-called Longworth amendment.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The roll call referred to follows:

Mr. GOSS. Mr. Speaker, this is an important matter, and I doubt if there is a quorum present.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, I was going to join with the gentleman from Connecticut by saying it is such an insignificant matter that I think a quorum should be present.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman make the point of order that there is no quorum present?

Mr. GOSS. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw my point of order.

Mr. MICHENER. Mr. Speaker, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GIFFORD].

Mr. GIFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I think the House knows that for some time I acted as chairman of this committee and am now the ranking member on the minority side.

When, some eight years ago, this matter was brought to my attention I was not particularly interested in having more amendments added to the Constitution. The "lame-duck" amendment, so called, standing by itself, did not greatly appeal to me, but when our much respected Clerk, Tyler Page, who has been here for 50 years, told us that there were 12 unanswerable questions which it was the plain duty of our committee to look into, I became convinced that there was a very great necessity for an amendment to the Constitution.

The lame-duck amendment is of very little importance compared to section 3 and section 4. Just because something has not happened in 140 years is no reason why it may not happen. And that danger was foreseen 100 years.

Mr. GOSS. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. Evidently there is not a quorum present.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House.

A call of the House was ordered.

The Clerk called the roll, and the following Members failed to answer to their names:

The SPEAKER. Three hundred and eight Members have answered to their names; a quorum is present.

On motion of Mr. POU, further proceedings under the call were dispensed with.

Mr. GIFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I should like to have it understood by the membership of the House that I was not responsible for the roll call, but rather requested that it should not be made.

When my remarks were interrupted I was explaining that the first part of this resolution, the so-called "lame-duck" section, did not appeal to me as being important enough for a constitutional amendment to be presented to the country. But I felt otherwise when it was shown us how important the other matters are which are now incorporated in sections 3 and 4, and have to deal with the event the President elect, or the Vice President elect, or both die before their respective successors are named.

However, I do favor the "lame-duck" provision in the proposed amendment. Looking into the matter from my own standpoint, I would prefer not to come back here and legislate after having been defeated, because I suppose I would have to continue in my former frame of mind and sometimes vote directly against the exact wishes of my constituents as expressed in the election of my opponent. So I am now in favor of that proposition.

It is perfectly clear that nearly all the difference of opinion now comes on the limitation of the second session, having in mind elections held in those years and the national convention every four years. For one, I heartily agree that there should be a limitation on the second session.

My reasons may be a little different from those advanced by some others, but I have in mind that there is another body in the Congress. That body has vastly altered in the last many years, until to-day we have to reckon with that change, and I do not want the time ever to come when we can not extricate ourselves from the interminable delays originating in that body. And if the so-called Longworth amendment should fail, I shall offer an amendment that it seems to me should be satisfactory.

In the debates of last year the argument was made that we should not surrender our rights to the Executive, that we should not be called in to extra session merely at the whim of the Executive, but that we should hold to our own rights; and my proposed amendment provides that although we shall agree to terminate the second session on May 4 there would be the added words "unless the Congress appoint a different day." Hence if May 1 comes and we find we can not get through on May 4 by joint action of the Congress we can continue, without any consideration of what the President may desire. But the action should be joint. It should not be left to the whim of either branch to prolong sessions indefinitely.

I do not wish to be unparliamentary, but I think that a very serious condition becomes apparent when we compare the two bodies. We of the House seem not to trust ourselves. We tie ourselves up with all sorts of rules. We scarcely have time for reasonable debate. Even five minutes is very often hard to obtain. In the other branch, however, there are no such limiting rules. The Senate might actually keep us in continuous session. There have been occasions when for weeks we have had to stay here and recess three days at a time waiting for them to exhaust themselves in endless debate.

The third and fourth articles are, I feel, extremely important. If there should be no President of the United States having qualified on the 4th day of March, it would be a most serious matter.

Because of the Jefferson-Burr controversy, as you remember, it became necessary to pass the twelfth amendment, and I wish to read a little from the argument presented on the floor of the Senate in order to show to this House the high character of the debate of those days. No wonder Governor MONTAGUE, the gentleman from Virginia, and others have often spoken in the House and reminded us of the debates of our fathers. I read for days the debates of 1803 on the twelfth amendment, and the high character of those debates seems far ahead, I am sorry to say, of what is carried on to-day.

If there had been no President of the United States elected—

Hear this from the Senators of the old days of 1803—

there would have been every reason to believe that gloomy, indeed, would have been the prospect. A long train of evils, incalculable in their consequences, could hardly have failed to overspread the face of this delightful country. Indeed, sir, what would have been the ultimate issue it is not within the compass of human foresight to divine. This great, this flourishing country, which at this time pours forth innumerable streams of prosperity displaying in vast and rich variety every means of individual happiness, every means of national happiness, and every means of true national glory, instead of exhibiting the present pleasing, animating prospect, before this period might have been enveloped in dark and dismal clouds of confusion, disorder, and political distraction. The bands of society being thus in a manner broken asunder and all the angry, turbulent passions incident to man left unrestrained, what fatal consequences might be expected to follow! What violence of party, what rage of ambition, what dreadful commotions, might be expected to agitate this then unfortunate country! And, sir, is there a single American living whose blood is so far chilled with indifference concerning the fate of this country, that he would not be stricken with awful alarm at the prospect of such an event—an event tending directly to produce so complete a state of anarchy with all its concomitant calamities?

I think it is perfectly parliamentary to read the speech of Mr. OLIVER of New York, made last year, during which he said on page 5981 of the RECORD:

Mr. Chairman, ladies and gentlemen of the committee, I remember that when the House and the Senate were first formed, they said the House of Representatives was like a cup into which the coffee was poured hot and that the Senate was like the saucer in which it cooled off. Now time has changed that and the saucer has become Tabasco sauce, dynamite, gasoline, and the only cool body left is the cup of the House of Representatives. [Laughter.]

I have shown you the character of senatorial debate in former days. Now, with what humility must we read the Senate debate of yesterday, or the day before, when the Senator from Nebraska made use of this language, as appears in the RECORD:

A bright newspaper man last night over the radio told us that Mr. Dawes had left his knee breeches over in London and that Andy was going to wear them when he got over there. Think what a spectacle he would present standing on his diminutive pipestems in Dawes's breeches in the presence of aristocracy in the greatest diplomatic center on earth! [Laughter.]

A great man once said that anyone who could make two blades of grass grow where only one grew before was a benefactor of the human race. My judgment is that Andy will not wear Dawes's breeches, but, following in the pathway of the man who made two blades of grass grow where one grew before, he will take a pair of his trousers and cut them in two slightly above the knee and thus have two pairs of trousers where only one existed before.

Mr. HOWARD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GIFFORD. I yield.

Mr. HOWARD. Does the gentleman from Massachusetts think it is wicked on the part of the Senator from Nebraska to quote the words of a former Vice President, and now the practical President? [Laughter.]

Mr. GIFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I remind the gentleman from Nebraska that I am talking about the present-day speeches on the floor of the other body.

Mr. HOWARD. And I am for them. [Laughter.]

Mr. GIFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I am extremely sorry to hear such an acknowledgment from my dear friend, the gentleman from Nebraska. I had hoped that the House does not feel that way about it.

Mr. Speaker, as I said before, the point of difference is on the limitation. I am willing that by joint action of the House and the Senate Congress may sit longer in session. That is fair, and that removes all the objections which were made last year, to the effect that we should be ruled by the whim of the President as to whether we had a special session or not.

Mr. Speaker, when the resolution originally came over from the Senate I thought that it was a lame-duck proposition with which they were chiefly concerned, but after the several days in conference I was made to realize, to my amazement, that the principal thing in their minds was to do away with the short session of Congress. The lame-duck provision seemed a very secondary matter.

In the committee of conference of last year the House conferees proposed that the limitation of the session should be made on June 4. Was that agreeable? No. The suggestion was then made that it should be July 4. But no; there was not a spark of the spirit of compromise, even though we had voted in this House by 229 to 148 in favor of the limitation after long and full debate, whereas there had been little, if any, debate on limitation in the Senate.

The Senator from Arizona, Mr. ASHURST, about 10 years ago presented this matter in the most extended discussion that has been held in that other body. Much credit belongs to the Senator from Arizona in bringing this matter to the attention of the Congress at that time.

When the Senate resolution came before our committee, our good friend the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. LOZIER], a member thereof, gave the matter much study, as did several others. The author of the resolution was requested to appear before us and was informed that the Senate resolution would have to be greatly changed and would require careful consideration. To-day we see that everything has been stricken out after the enacting clause and a new resolution has been written.

For eight long years the committee has given careful consideration to this. We now have a resolution favored by the American Bar Association, which has given the subject exceedingly careful consideration and has for many years been in favor of the proposed changes. Our late Speaker Longworth told you last year that the American Bar Association favored this limitation of May 4.

Mr. Speaker, as a member of the committee I will vote for the resolution whether these amendments are carried or not, but I reserve the right to support as strongly as I can the principle of a limitation by which we can ourselves have equal rights with the Senate regarding the date of adjournment. [Applause.]

Mr. POU. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. O'CONNOR]. [Applause.]

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, in this Seventy-second Congress of the United States there are many great problems confronting us. Such questions have never before been presented to our country in all its history. During the past 160 years of our liberty we have divided politically on only two questions. Men have been elected President, party platforms have been framed with the chief difference between the major political parties, first, slavery, and later, the tariff. To-day, however, we are faced with an economic situation in this Nation and likewise throughout the world which requires the greatest leadership, which requires men of the greatest insight into economic, financial, and reconstructive policies.

Here we are to-day, I remind you, spending two precious days of this first session of the Seventy-second Congress, considering what, to my mind, is a most insignificant piece of legislation. [Applause.]

Why, the Congress of the United States, with 8,000,000 of our citizens unemployed and hungry, should devote two whole days—and maybe more—of its time to considering this particular constitutional amendment is beyond my conception. If I have any capacity to hear the voice of our people, I know they are unalterably opposed to any constitutional amendment, meritorious or not, except an amendment to repeal the despicable eighteenth amendment.

While I can not subscribe entirely to the remarks made yesterday as to leadership in this House, I do want to say to the country the primary purpose of our Democratic majority should be to solve the present unparalleled economic situation which confronts our Nation to-day. [Applause.] We should not waste our valuable time with a measure such as this—conceived by crackaloos, propagated by crackpots, and supported by thoughtless demagogues.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Speaker, a point of order. The gentleman is out of order in making reference to the author of this resolution in the other body.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will proceed in order.

Mr. O'CONNOR. My colleague from Harlem diverted me.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Speaker, I make a point of order that the gentleman is again out of order, and I ask that his words be taken down.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will proceed in order.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, why does the public sometimes laugh at us here? Why, I have heard it said that a half million dollars has been spent in this Congress in an attempt to change the name of a mountain out in the State of Washington from Rainier to Tacoma. The propaganda beseeched us not to continue the name of a great English explorer as the patron of such a lofty peak, but that our patriotism should impel us to change the name to that of an illustrious Indian polygamist, Chief Tacoma. I further am informed that hundreds of thousands of dollars have been spent in propagating the idea of having 13 months in the year. Our CONGRESSIONAL RECORD is filled with charts and diagrams worrying over the "Wandering Sabbath." I do not know whether the idea is Chinese or Harlem. [Laughter.] What I mean to call to your attention is that the country laughs at us for wasting the time of the Congress of the United States on such insignificant matters. Why, the gentleman from Cape Cod [Mr. GIFFORD]—and those words can be taken down, too—should weep copious tears over the importance of this resolution I leave to your own sense of humor. What I can not understand is why two precious days—48 hours—of this Congress should be devoted to such an insignificant, unimportant proposition such as this. Will anybody here tell me what difference it makes whether we meet on March 4 or January 24? We are in session right now. Let us devote our present time to doing something for the benefit of our country. Have we done it yet?

Why, we have swallowed, hook, line, and sinker, everything from the other end of Pennsylvania Avenue. I hear a great number of Members saying, "Right." Of course I am right. Everybody here knows what I am saying is right. To-day we should be bringing up on our own Democratic initiative—rather than waiting for another body or the Executive to hand us a bill—many of the proposals to remedy our economic situation, such, for instance, as the Costigan-La Follette bill to provide $375,000,000, or what not, to relieve unemployment. We should be doing that and many other things. Now, let us get down to just that work.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. POU. Mr. Speaker, I yield one additional minute to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. O'CONNOR. The only possibility by which this resolution—and it is not entitled to the dignity of that name; at least, the capital should be omitted—should pass the House is with the so-called Longworth amendment. [Applause.]

"How long, O Lord, how long" must we wait for the leadership of this House to assert itself?

Is this all we are here for, to determine when we shall meet and when we shall adjourn? The country wants us to do something. In good times business wants us to adjourn. In bad times they lay all their troubles on our doorstep. We have not done all we should do yet. Let us do it now and stop this "monkey business," if I may call it that, about when we shall meet and when we shall adjourn. [Applause.]

Mr. POU. Mr. Speaker, I yield the remainder of my time to the gentleman from New York [Mr. CELLER].

Mr. MICHENER. Mr. Speaker, I understand we have some time remaining on this side.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has consumed all of his time. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. MICHENER] spoke for 5 minutes, the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD] for 10 minutes, and the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GIFFORD] for 15 minutes, which makes a total of 30 minutes.

Mr. POU. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Michigan have five additional minutes on his side.

Mr. CELLER. Reserving the right to object, I will not object if I am not taken from the floor.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will not be taken from the floor.

Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from North Carolina?

There was no objection.

Mr. POU. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from New York [Mr. CELLER] the remaining time I have.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Chairman, I regret the unseemly language of my colleague the gentleman from New York [Mr. O'CONNOR] with reference to this bill. It is not insignificant.

It is one of the most important pieces of legislation we will have to deal with in this session, or any other session, regardless of the importance of the problem of unemployment, which in due course will also be solved in this Chamber as well as in the other Chamber.

I remind my colleague from New York that he used language, to my mind, which was rather shocking, concerning a venerable and distinguished Member of the other Chamber, whom I again remind the gentleman had the courage and the stamina in the face of vilification and persecution from some certain benighted Republicans to support that sterling Democrat, Alfred E. Smith, for the Presidency. [Applause.] I admire a man who, though a Republican, is willing to come forward and recognize the splendid qualifications exemplified in the personage of Alfred E. Smith, a great Democrat. [Applause.] Therefore we should not permit use of remarks of that character concerning him.

Now, gentlemen, this is the lame-duck resolution. What is a lame duck? A lame duck is a wild bird that has been hit with a bullet by a hunter and is brought down. It is not killed, merely lamed and wounded. It is usually tractable, docile, and is easily tamed. So it is with lame ducks in this House and probably in the other House. They have been hit with the shot of defeat by their constituents, and they become very lame, docile, and tractable, and when they have jobs dangled before them they do the bidding of the Executive or those who may be in power.

Now, it seems to me inconceivable that for these many years lame ducks defeated by their constituents have been able to come back to this House and vote on any proposition, be it appropriations or what not. It is inconceivable that we should allow something as illogical as that to adhere as a barnacle to our Constitution, and give these lame Members, repudiated at the polls, the right, for example, to vote for a President or a Vice President, as was the case on three distinct occasions in this Chamber. It is as ridiculous, if not as barbarous, as the old Chinese custom of binding up the feet of their children. We should do away with it. No country on the face of God's footstool allows 13 months to elapse between the time of an election and the proroguing of their parliaments. It may startle and surprise you to know that nowhere else do we have that great so-called cooling period of 13 months between the election and the coming together of the duly elected representatives of the people. It is argued that during the 13 months the passions and prejudices stirred up by a political campaign will have become dissipated. That is ridiculous. The people should have the opportunity to register their wishes through their representatives as soon after election as possible. They should not be compelled to wait 13 months. That is not representative government.

In no country other than ours does 13 months elapse between election and convocation of parliament. The practice in Great Britain, Canada, Australia, and New Zealand has been to make the interval between elections and the summoning of parliaments as short as possible. In France the Chamber of Deputies meets 10 days after election. In Norway the election is in November and the meeting in January. In Sweden the election occurs in September and the lower house convenes in January.

In Germany the Reichstag assembles not later than 30 days after the election. This lapse of 30 days appears in almost all constitutions in the Republics of Europe created out of the World War. In Italy the King is authorized to prorogue the sessions and to dissolve the Chamber of Deputies any time he sees fit. In the event of a dissolution, however, the King must order new elections and convoke a new meeting within the space of four months. In Austria the Nationalrat must be summoned by the President to meet within 30 days after election. In Hungary the new Diet must meet six weeks after it has been elected. In Brazil the Chamber of Deputies assembles May 3—unless a sooner day is designated by law—following election, which occurs on the first Sunday in February. In Argentina the House of Deputies meets in regular session from May 1 to September 30. The election occurs on the first Sunday in March of even-numbered years.

In all the constitutions that grew out of the treaty of Versailles the period is usually 30 days between election and convocation of parliament. It should be similar here.

Mr. WILLIAM E. HULL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CELLER. Yes.

Mr. WILLIAM E. HULL. Does the gentleman favor allowing Congress to continue indefinitely in the second term?

Mr. CELLER. The Congress does not continue indefinitely. The Congress is elected for two years and the Congress continues for two years now.

Mr. WILLIAM E. HULL. But there is an adjournment on March 4. What I want to bring out is whether the gentleman would favor the elimination of a definite time for adjournment in the second term?

Mr. CELLER. I am not in favor of that. I want no constitutional limitation. Congress can set its own day for adjournment. The Congress would not continue in session for all of the two years. The Congress would not continue indefinitely two years. That is inconceivable. Under the present régime we do not continue indefinitely. We could go right on till next December and then on till March 4, 1933. But instead we will adjourn around June 15—the latest July 1—to enable us to attend the national convention. Does that answer the gentleman's question?

Mr. WILLIAM E. HULL. That does not answer my question. I wanted to bring out whether the gentleman was in favor of having the Congress continue in session indefinitely in the second term?

Mr. CELLER. I would not favor making a definite time for adjournment and embed it in the Constitution. We can trust ourselves not to continue our labors without respite, without vacation. We would set an appropriate date for adjournment each year. The idea of putting a limitation on any amendment that in the even-numbered year—now the year of the short session ending March 4—so that the session in that year shall not go beyond, say, May 4, seems to me repugnant to this pending Norris amendment. In that event we would still have a so-called short session. It would extend to May 4 instead of March 4.

I herewith set forth remarks of mine in the Seventieth Congress:

The very reason that actuated the Members in the other Chamber in bringing about this Norris amendment to the Constitution was to do away with the obnoxious filibuster. But what do you do by this May 4 amendment? I say to the members of the committee that you still continue the filibuster. You had presented to you the handle of a sword that would cut out the filibuster, but you have failed to grasp it. I have as yet to hear a proper explanation as to why you have put the May 4 provision in the resolution. There is no reason why you should fix the limitation as of May 4. Why can you not leave that out and disregard it entirely as the Senate did? They set no limitation, and, you know, if you leave it at May 4 and there are men who are "filibuster minded," as it were, when that day approaches they are going to train their guns so as to conduct a filibuster and talk against time. But if you have the right to change the date from time to time and the session draws near to the day agreed for closing and a filibuster is brewing, then you can agree to postpone for a week or two weeks or indefinitely the closing time, and thus frustrate the plans of those who would filibuster.

Under the proposed amendment you are blocked. You can not agree to adjourn beyond May 4. That becomes the constitutional limitation of time for adjournment, just as now that limitation is March 4. Filibusters always occur just before March 4 of the even years. Under the proposal they will occur just prior to May 4. There is really no difference. If we are going to do a job, let us do the job right.

Mr. TILSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CELLER. I yield.

Mr. TILSON. Does the gentleman undertake to say that we are limited now as to the time of meeting and adjournment? Did not the gentleman hear the gentleman from Texas when he explained thoroughly how we now have absolute power under the Constitution to meet any day within the two years?

Mr. CELLER. Yes; but because the term of office comes to an end on March 4 of the even year, you can not go beyond that by constitutional limitation.

Mr. TILSON. Of course, we can not go beyond the period for which we are elected, but we can fix any date within that period of time under the Constitution now.

Mr. CELLER. Yes; adjourn any time up to March 4, but you can not now even turn back the hands of the clock after noon March 4, as was often tried.

Mr. TILSON. Certainly not after our term of office or our commission has expired.

Mr. CELLER. I say that should not occur; in other words, you can take away the May 4 limitation and you will do away with the obnoxious filibuster. There should be no short session either to March 4 or May 4. Both sessions should be indefinite, as the long session is now. That is not provided in this resolution, and for that reason I hope an amendment will be offered to strike out that date.

Mr. LOWREY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CELLER. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. LOWREY. I think I agree with the gentleman about removing this limitation of May 4, but that has been mentioned several times, and I believe it ought to be said that this does give at least two more months than we have now for the short term, and there is that much advantage over the present situation.

Mr. CELLER. Oh, yes; indeed. There is the advantage of that small period of time over the present condition; but I say when you have at hand the means of going further, why not take advantage of such means?

Mr. LOWREY. Why not set the time for opening further back and give us longer than three months for the short session? Congress has the right to do that.

Mr. CELLER. Congress is authorized to do that, except that the sessions can not begin prior to December 1.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. MICHENER. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA].

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Speaker, I hope my colleague from New York will not step out just now.

Mr. O'CONNOR. I will stay.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I was very much impressed with the confession made by my colleague from New York [Mr. O'CONNOR], who came here in the early part of the session and announced to the whole world that he was going to be the floor leader of the Democratic Party; but the vicissitudes of his party seemed to ordain otherwise. When the gentleman from New York complains of the inactivity of Congress, and of the House in particular, permit me to remind him that he is one of the outstanding leaders of the party in control. He is an influential member of the powerful Committee on Rules, and it is within his power to bring on the floor any legislation he deems the country requires at this time. I will ask him to bring before this House the Costigan-La Follette relief bill. Is the gentleman for that bill? I am. I will ask him to bring before this House the Wagner construction bill to provide work for the unemployed. I ask him to use his influence to bring before this House a plan for national unemployment insurance. But to date I have not seen any activity on the part of the distinguished member of the Rules Committee [Mr. O'CONNOR] on any of these measures. Yet he talks about wasting time. I will say to the gentleman from New York that it is up to him to bring about this activity for which he has so eloquently pleaded.

In reference to the gentleman's sneering remark about the district which I represent, I am proud to represent Harlem in the House of Representatives. [Applause.] I am not ashamed of it. I would not refer to the gentleman's district by sneering at it; but I will say to the gentleman from New York——

Mr. GAVAGAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Yes; I will yield to my colleague from New York.

Mr. GAVAGAN. I hope the gentleman knows I represent the better part of Harlem, New York. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I will say to my colleague that he, too, represents a good part of Harlem and incidentally that he is trying to add it to my district in the reapportionment. I will gladly accept it and will be proud to represent west Harlem as well as east Harlem. [Applause.]

I am certain that the gentleman from New York [Mr. O'CONNOR] will, upon reflection, regret the offensive reference to one of the greatest living statesmen of this country. Senator GEORGE NORRIS is the author of this resolution. Like many other reforms that he has sponsored, in this instance he has labored long and patiently but always effectively. He is often subjected to abuse and always this abuse comes from quarters who are seeking some undue advantage or some special privilege and who are opposed to the beneficial and progressive legislation which the Senator sponsors. I am proud to be of the same school of politics as the distinguished Senator from Nebraska, the author of this resolution. Nothing that has been said by his many, many enemies who do not want to see legislation to better conditions of the people, a better administration of justice, and the protection of the natural resources of the country, has injured or can injure this great man.

Mr. Speaker, as my colleague from New York [Mr. CELLER] said, this bill is not an unimportant, insignificant bill. Instead of making it appear, as the gentleman from New York is endeavoring to do, that it only provides for appearing here in March, we will come here in January, as my colleague from New York has said, it means that instead of convening 13 months after the election we will convene two and a half months after the election and be able to translate the wishes and the issues of the American people into legislation immediately after election. That is in keeping with true democracy. I want to warn the House to beware of amendments on this resolution. If you want to bring about a change in the Constitution and provide for the meeting of Congress immediately after election, vote down every amendment and make the passage of the resolution certain. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. POU. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the adoption of the resolution.

The previous question was ordered.

The resolution was agreed to.

Mr. JEFFERS. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of joint resolution (S. J. Res. 14) proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States fixing the commencement of the terms of President and Vice President and Members of Congress and fixing the time of the assembling of Congress.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 14), with Mr. BULWINKLE in the chair.

The Clerk read the title of the joint resolution.

Mr. JEFFERS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the first reading of the joint resolution be dispensed with.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Alabama?

There was no objection.

Mr. JEFFERS. Mr. Chairman, I will consume 10 minutes.

Mr. Chairman, this matter, as everyone knows, has been under consideration several times in this body and has been discussed at length. I trust that during the discussion to-day the Members of the House will observe the meaning of the rule and devote themselves to the contents of the proposed amendment.

Let me say that this is a very important constitutional amendment. We have often seen the chaotic condition in the Congress which comes about during the so-called short session, or so-called "lame-duck" session, of the Congress when Members of Congress who have been defeated at the preceding November election take it upon themselves to shackle the Congress in both branches and interfere with, or even prevent, the consideration of important legislation upon which the country wants action. So I regard this as a very important reform and one which should receive the careful attention and thoughtful consideration of all Members.

Let me say that in appearing here to-day on the majority side in charge of the time on this bill, I am simply acting in the place of our beloved and esteemed colleague, Mr. Rutherford, of Georgia, who passed away a few days ago. I am taking his place at this time, and I want to say that the work on this bill at this session of Congress was done largely by our esteemed and beloved colleague, Mr. Rutherford, of Georgia, before he was called away from us. He labored on the report for the two or three days just prior to his untimely death, and has presented to us a splendid report, which the Members will find very helpful in the consideration of this proposed constitutional amendment.

Let me also say that the material in this report is taken largely from the report compiled last year through the efforts of the then chairman of the committee, now the ranking minority member, the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GIFFORD]. Great credit is due to the gentleman from Massachusetts as well as to our late chairman, Mr. Rutherford.

Now, let me try to explain the resolution which is before us. Section 1 of the Senate joint resolution, which is superseded by the language of the Rutherford bill as we have it now, provides that—

> The terms of the President and Vice President shall end at noon on the 15th day of January, and the terms of Senators and Representatives at noon on the 2d day of January, of the years in which such terms would have ended if this article had not been ratified; and the terms of their successors shall then begin.

We have stricken out all after the enacting clause of the resolution as it passed the Senate and substituted the Rutherford bill, section 1 of which proposes that—

> The terms of the President and Vice President shall end at noon on the 24th day of January, and the terms of Senators and Representatives at noon on the 4th day of January, of the years in which such terms would have ended if this article had not been ratified; and the terms of their successors shall then begin.

Section 2 of the Senate resolution provides that—

> The Congress shall assemble at least once in every year, and such meeting shall begin at noon on the 2d day of January, unless they shall by law appoint a different day.

The text of the House bill changes this to January 4 and still carries the proviso "unless Congress by law appoints a different day." Now, it is on this section that it has been proposed, or suggested, here that an amendment may be offered to place a limiting date on the ending of that even-numbered year session of the Congress.

Now, such a limiting date, I feel, would be a foolish thing for the Congress to adopt. Suppose, looking forward 20, 30, or even 50 years, and longer, it develops that Congress actually needs more time each year to complete its business, we can not foresee what the business of the Nation may be 50 years hence, and if they do need more time then they will find that we have shackled them by placing in the Constitution of the United States a fixed and certain date beyond which they could not go, save by the calling of a special session of Congress.

And suppose they have down at the other end of the Avenue a Chief Executive who refuses to call the necessary special session of Congress. The Congress must simply go out of existence if such an arbitrary limiting date is placed in the Constitution of the United States. And even if such an amendment should be adopted, as the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GIFFORD] proposes, the Senate would be in position to absolutely block the House, or the House could block the Senate, because it would require the joint action of both Houses. I think it would be very presumptuous in this Congress to adopt such an arbitrary limiting date to apply for all time to come, because we can not foresee what need may come up in the future. We should allow future Congresses to control that for themselves, according to what they, in their own judgment, may then determine to be necessary and wise.

The first sentence of section 3 of the Senate resolution provides that whenever the right of choice of a President devolves upon the House, the Vice President shall act as President, as in the case of the death or other constitutional disability of the President, if the House has not chosen a President before the time fixed for the beginning of his term. The corresponding provision of the House amendment—the first clause of the second sentence of section 3—is broader in that the Vice President elect acts as President not only when the House fails to choose a President before the time fixed for the beginning of his term but also in any case where at that time the President fails to qualify for any reason. This part of the House amendment specifically provides that the Vice President in such cases acts as President only until a President has qualified. The Senate resolution on this point fails to state whether the Vice President acts as President for the whole term or only until a President has been elected or has qualified.

The second sentence of section 3 of the Senate resolution gives Congress the power by law to declare what officer shall act as President in a case where the election of the President is thrown into the House and that of the Vice President is thrown into the Senate, and neither the President nor the Vice President is chosen before the time fixed for the beginning of their terms. This includes not only the case where the failure of both to qualify is caused by the failure of the House to choose a President and the failure of the Senate to choose a Vice President, but also other causes of the failure of both to qualify, such as resignation, death, inability, ineligibility, and so forth. Under the House amendment the law of Congress may declare who shall act as President or the manner of selecting a qualified person to act. The person so acting as President may act only until a President or Vice President has qualified.

Section 4 of the House amendment gives Congress the power to provide by law means by which a President or a Vice President may be selected, when the right of choice devolves upon either body, if any of the persons from whom the House may choose a President or the Senate may choose a Vice President, as the case may be, has died. There is no corresponding provision in the Senate resolution.

Section 4 of the Senate resolution provides that the constitutional amendment shall take effect on the 15th of October after its ratification. Section 5 of the House amendment provides that sections 1 and 2 of the constitutional amendment shall take effect on the 30th of November of the year following the year in which the constitutional amendment is ratified. Under the Senate resolution the provisions relating to the terms of President, Vice President, Senators, and Representatives, and the provisions relating to the meeting day of Congress, take effect on the 15th of October next following ratification, whereas under the House amendment such provisions take effect on the 30th of November of the year following the year of ratification. Under the Senate resolution the provisions relating to the contingencies with respect to the filling of the office of President take effect on the 15th of October, following ratification whereas under the House amendment such provisions take effect upon ratification.

Now, Mr. Chairman and my colleagues, your committee has given very careful consideration to this complicated and technical matter, and I feel that we have inserted some very helpful and remedial provisions in the resolution which should be included in the proposed constitutional amendment and submitted to the States for ratification. Permit me to say that we feel that we have put only constructive matter into this resolution.

I believe your committee has given thoughtful attention and careful consideration to the matter, and has presented a resolution which should pass as it is now written. Let us not "muddy the waters" and spoil the chances for the final adoption of this much-needed constitutional amendment by adding unnecessary and unwise amendments to it. [Applause.]

Mr. RAMSEYER. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. CABLE].

Mr. CABLE. Mr. Chairman, our Constitution contains no provision relative to the beginning of the term of the President. The Constitution was ratified by the ninth State on July 2, 1788, and thereupon became operative. Thereafter the Continental Congress set "the first Wednesday in March next"—March 4, 1789—as the day Congress should convene and the President should be inaugurated. It happens that the first Wednesday was the 4th of March, and for that reason Congress convenes and a President is inaugurated on March 4. There were reasons then, not existing to-day, for a considerable period of intervention between election and commencement of work by the new Congress. Originally Senators were elected by the legislatures; these legislatures did not convene until January or February. By the seventeenth amendment the Senators are now elected in November. Communication and transportation have greatly improved. The first House did not organize until April 2; the Senate on April 6. Thereafter the electoral votes were counted. It was not until April 30, 1789, that George Washington was inaugurated President. Now there is no reason to wait until March for the convening of Congress. The delay now occasioned by the convening of Congress until December of the following year often causes the expenditure of a large sum of money. For example, we usually have 8 or 10 election contests in the House, and very often a few in the Senate. Thirteen months now intervene until Congress convenes and is ready to consider the contests. If the contestant is finally seated, it means that the taxpayers of this country pay two men for representing that particular district. As proposed by this amendment, Congress shall meet on January 4 following the election. The contested cases will quickly be decided and the rightful holder of the seat will be determined and considerable salary and clerk hire money will be saved.

An important part of this amendment, in my opinion, is the fact that the majority people have a right to have created quickly into law their own desires as expressed at the November election. Under our present method, as we all well know, an election occurring in November, the new Congress does not begin to legislate for almost a year and a half. The will of the majority may be denied. The delay of 13 months in convening of Congress prevents a new Member from showing his worth before he must campaign for reelection. He has no record to present to his constituents. But there is an equally important provision in this amendment and that is this——

Mr. GIBSON. Will the gentleman yield right there?

Mr. CABLE. I yield.

Mr. GIBSON. Is it not a fact that Congress, under the Constitution, has the power to fix the date for its meeting?

Mr. CABLE. Congress has the power to fix the date.

Mr. GIBSON. For its assembly?

Mr. CABLE. Yes; but since the term of the President is for 4 years, and of a Member of the House is 2 years, and of a Senator 6 years, the convening of Congress can not be changed except by a constitutional amendment.

Mr. GIBSON. Is it not true that the Congress on various occasions has fixed some other date than the first Monday in December for assembling?

Mr. CABLE. Congress has that full authority, but the beginning of the term is March 4.

Mr. GIBSON. But has it not fixed a date other than the first Monday in December for convening upon no less than 18 occasions?

Mr. CABLE. That is for the assembling of Congress, but the term begins March 4.

Mr. GIBSON. But there is nothing to prevent a session of Congress before it adjourns to fix the meeting time of the next session.

Mr. CABLE. There is no inhibition in the Constitution, as I understand, as to the date of assembling, but to carry into effect the will of the people and the enactment of laws promised in the convention and campaigns we must change the present date of the assembling of Congress. The reasons for the March date no longer exist. We should meet earlier, not later; that requires a constitutional amendment.

But there is another important reason why we should change the present situation. Our machinery has been amended once already relative to the selection of the President. We now have the twelfth amendment. This is the first time that I am aware where we seek to amend for the second time any part of the Constitution of the United States. The framers of our Constitution and the Congress that wrote the twelfth amendment left defects or inadequate machinery for the selection of the President. Let me call attention to this fact: If a President elect should die, if he should become disqualified, and likewise the Vice President, the United States of America would be without a President and Vice President. A constitutional amendment is not necessary to provide for the case of the death of a party nominee before the November election. Presidential electors and not the President are chosen at the November election. The electors would be free to choose a President, notwithstanding the death of a party nominee. This same rule applies in event of the death of a party nominee after the November election and before the electors' vote.

But if the President elect and the Vice President elect should both die or become disabled or found disqualified before March 4 our country would be without a President. Dire results would follow. The law dealing with succession applies to the President, not the President elect.

Sections 3 and 4 of the House resolution provide remedies against the contingencies I have just called to your attention.

Second, if the President elect could not be determined on a count of the electoral votes, the election would be thrown into the House. Under our present procedure we would have a Congress that may have been repudiated at the polls making the selection for the American people of a President for the four following years. In all fairness to the people, I say to you that the recently elected Congress rather than the Congress which has been defeated should be the one to determine who will be President.

If the gentleman from New York, who criticized this resolution a while ago, would take five minutes of his time to study the measure and consider the very serious and important points of the resolution he would not have made the statement he made concerning it.

We have had this resolution before our committee for 10 or 12 years. It has been before this House under able leadership, as has been pointed out by the gentleman from Alabama; the Members, in my opinion, are ready to vote on it, and it should be carried overwhelmingly.

I submit and prophesy that when submitted to the legislatures of the various States it will quickly be ratified and become a part of our Constitution; and when it does, the safety of the American people so far as the Presidency is concerned, and the security of the American people so far as placing on our statute books the will expressed by the last election will be assured.

Mr. JEFFERS. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. LOZIER].

Mr. LOZIER. Mr. Chairman, I very seriously regret my inability to agree with my worthy colleague from New York [Mr. O'CONNOR] in his ex cathedra pronunciamento that this resolution is insignificant legislation. If it is insignificant legislation to so amend the Constitution of the United States so that the will of the electorate may be speedily crystallized and translated into legislation, then this is insignificant legislation. If it is insignificant legislation to provide against a calamity that may result from a deadlock in the Electoral College, which would thwart the will of the people and compel the members of a political party in this House, voting by States, to vote for the candidate for President of an opposite political faith, and thereby disfranchise them from voting for a man who represents their political convictions, then this is insignificant legislation.

If it is insignificant legislation to correct the present system under which Members of Congress are elected and then stand by and remain inactive 13 months before a regular session of Congress convenes, and before they can express and reflect the will of their constituents, then this is insignificant legislation. Under the present arrangement, when the people pass judgment on parties and policies in a November election, they must wait 13 months before their will can be registered in Congress. Does the gentleman consider legislation curing this outrageous condition insignificant?

Under the present system, when a Representative has been repudiated at the polls, and another person chosen by the voters to succeed him, does the gentleman think the repudiated Congressman should be permitted to return to Congress and for four months speak for and represent the people who by their ballots have chosen another agent or representative to speak for them?

Does not the gentleman think that the newly elected Representative who comes fresh from the people with a vote of approval and confidence, should speak for and represent the people rather than the rejected and discarded Representative? Should a Representative, no matter how good and able he may be, but whose policies have been repudiated by his constituents, be allowed to come back to Congress for four months, and vote for and secure the enactment of legislation that his constituents have repudiated?

I want to say to my worthy friend from New York that in my nine years' experience in this Chamber I do not believe any bill or resolution has ever been considered by Congress that embodies as wholesome, wise, and important provisions as this resolution. The question involved in the pending resolution is whether or not the American people have a right to express their will and opinions on public questions, and then to have their opinions and mandates presented to Congress and crystalized into legislation without 13 months' delay.

The resolution now under consideration represents many years' hard work by committees of the House and the Senate. For nine years I have been a member of the Committee on the Election of President, Vice President, and Representatives in Congress, which committee has jurisdiction of this legislation. We have studied the proposal from every standpoint. We have greatly enlarged its scope, and extended its provisions so as not only to eliminate the so-called "lame-duck" sessions of Congress but to provide for presidential succession in several contingencies for which the present Constitution has made no provision.

I want to say in this connection that if a resolution was ever industriously and studiously considered over a long term of years, and if a resolution ever came before the House in what is practically a perfect form, that is, embodying the last and best word that could be said upon the subject involved, in my opinion it is this resolution. And I hope I may not be considered presumptuous in making this claim.

Some reference has been made to the author of this resolution, a Member of another body of the Congress. I hold no brief for GEORGE W. NORRIS, the man whose name will go down in history as the great proponent of the principle embodied in this resolution, but I want to say, as I have said in this Chamber before, that when this resolution becomes a part of the Constitution of the United States, as it most surely will at no distant date, the lion's share of the credit will be due to the Senator from Nebraska, GEORGE W. NORRIS, the Tribune of the People, and outstanding advocate of social justice. The brilliant Irish poet and patriot of Boston, John Boyle O'Reilly, referring to William Lloyd Garrison, the Great Liberator, said:

He dared to be traitor to country
When country was traitor to right.

May I paraphrase this language and say of the Senator of Nebraska—

He dared to be traitor to party
When party was traitor to right.

With a commendable zeal he labored in season and out of season to have this principle incorporated in our organic law. Beset on every hand by the reactionary and stand-pat elements in both the Democratic and Republican Parties, he stood steadfast in favor of this legislation, because he realized, as the country realizes, that this resolution is a long step toward giving the people of the United States representative government in the true sense of that term. Let no thoughtless or envious man underappraise his services to his country in securing the submission and ratification of this amendment.

It is true that the resolution which we are now considering is not the original Senate resolution. Seemingly that resolution has been introduced in the Senate in practically the same form year after year and session after session, featuring the "lame-duck" part of the resolution, but omitting that part of the pending resolution relating to the presidential succession. The responsibility for perfecting that resolution and providing for contingencies which were not covered by the Senate resolution fell upon the House committee. While I had only a modest part in formulating this perfected bill, my whole soul is in this legislation, and I am looking forward with unalloyed pleasure to the time this resolution will become a part of our organic law.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LOZIER. Yes; I yield to my friend from New York.

Mr. O'CONNOR. The gentleman says it has been introduced in the same form.

Mr. LOZIER. Practically the same form in the Senate, but not in the form in which the House committee now presents it.

Mr. O'CONNOR. It has been amended at least forty times and the gentleman must know it bears no resemblance to the form in which it was introduced originally by the distinguished gentleman from Nebraska.

Mr. LOZIER. I am constrained to say that the gentleman from New York is in error. The first and second paragraphs are essentially the same as in the bill that was originally introduced in the Senate by the Senator from Nebraska. The third section in the pending bill is an enlargement and improvement of the provision of section 3 of the original Norris resolution. The fourth section in the House resolution was formulated by the House committee of which I am a member. The provisions of this section are not to be found in the Norris or Senate resolution. The first and second sections deal with the so-called "lame-duck" sessions of Congress, the terms of the President, Vice President, and Representatives in Congress, and the assembling date of Congress. The third and fourth sections relate to the presidential succession.

Credit for perfecting the third section and for the addition of the fourth section of this resolution is due to the House committee, but the proposal for eliminating the "lame-duck" session of Congress has been in every Senate bill since I entered Congress. Nothing that anyone can say or do will deprive the Senator from Nebraska of the credit for putting over the "lame-duck" provisions of this resolution, but to the House belongs the credit of providing for contingencies relating to the presidential succession which were not covered by the Senate bill.

Now, let me very briefly call your attention to the provisions of this bill. The original Norris bill made no provision for a contingency such as might have happened in 1924 or similar presidential contests. You will recall that there were three candidates for the Presidency—Calvin Coolidge, John W. Davis, and Robert M. La Follette—and there was a widespread opinion for many months that there would be a deadlock in the Electoral College, and that neither one of the three candidates would have a majority of the electoral votes. In that event, under the Constitution, the election would have been thrown into the House of Representatives—not the newly elected House of Representatives, but the old House of Representatives elected in 1922; not the House of Representatives coming fresh from the people, not the House of Representatives elected in the 1924 presidential election, not the House of Representatives that represented the last expression of the people, but the old House of Representatives selected two years before the three parties came to grips in the 1924 presidential election. Now, in electing a President when the Electoral College fails to perform that function, under the Constitution the Members of the House, voting by States, must vote for one of the highest three candidates who were voted for in the Electoral College. If one of the three dies, the choice is confined to the surviving two.

In 1924 suppose there had been a deadlock in the Electoral College, no candidate having a majority. Then the election would have been thrown into the House, the membership of which was elected in 1922. Also, suppose that between the time of the meeting of the Electoral College and the time the House met to elect a President, President Coolidge had died. Under the Constitution, you Republicans, voting by States, when your names were called, would have been in a very serious predicament. Mr. Coolidge being dead, you would not have had the privilege of voting for some other Republican for President, although the Republicans might have had, as they did have, a tremendous popular majority in the November, 1924, presidential election. You would have been bound down by the straight-jacket provisions of the Constitution and been compelled to vote for either John W. Davis or Robert M. La Follette, a situation no Republican, Democrat, or Progressive could justify.

On the other hand, in 1924 if there had been a deadlock in the Electoral College, and John W. Davis had died between the meeting of the electors and the assembling of the Congress, every Democratic Member of the House would not have had the poor privilege of voting for some other Democrat for President, but would have been disfranchised under the Constitution or been compelled to vote for Calvin Coolidge or Robert M. La Follette, which would have shocked the political conscience of an orthodox Democrat.

Section 4 of the pending resolution, which is the product of the labors of the House Committee, makes provision for a contingency of this kind and authorizes Congress to enact statutes so as to avoid the intolerable situation that may arise under the present provisions of the Constitution.

Mr. JEFFERS. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman two additional minutes.

Mr. LOZIER. I may say to the distinguished gentleman from New York that in section 4 we are providing a remedy that may prevent sedition or the disfranchisement of the major or minor party in a presidential election where the Electoral College fails to function and the election is thrown into the House.

It is an act of wisdom and patriotism for Congress to provide against contingencies of this kind that would result in injustice and perhaps precipitate sedition. Congress, looking into the future and seeing the dangerous complications that may at any time flow from the present unsatisfactory provisions of our Constitution, should have the foresight and courage to amend the Constitution so as to make impossible these dangerous conditions; and in all fairness it can not be said that an amendment that will accomplish this is insignificant and unimportant legislation?

And may I say, Mr. Chairman, in conclusion, the American people, when they express themselves at the ballot box, have the right to have their will respected and reflected in legislation. We must not set ourselves up as a wet nurse of the people. We have no right to ignore their mandates or delay the crystalization of their demands into laws. Under our form of government the American people have a right to be wrong, if they want to. According to the genius and spirit of our institutions, when policies and issues are submitted to the American people and they, speaking through the ballot box, pass on these policies, whether in your opinion their verdict is right or wrong, the people have the right to demand that their representatives meet speedily and translate their mandate into legislation, subject, of course, to constitutional limitations; and the man in this Congress or the man outside of Congress who opposes a policy and a principle of this kind is a stranger to the genius and the spirit of our institutions. I have made a number of speeches in this Chamber advocating the passage of this resolution. In view of the strong sentiment in favor of this proposed amendment, I will say no more. Let us pass this resolution by an overwhelming majority. [Applause.]

Mr. JEFFERS. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DICKINSON].

Mr. DICKINSON. Mr. Chairman, I am heartily in accord with this joint resolution seeking to amend the Constitution of the United States, and desire to speak briefly with reference to sections 1 and 2, which read as follows:

That the following amendment to the Constitution be, and hereby is, proposed to the States, to become valid as a part of said Constitution when ratified by the legislatures of the several States as provided in the Constitution:

"ARTICLE —

"SECTION 1. The terms of the President and Vice President shall end at noon on the 24th day of January, and the terms of Senators and Representatives at noon on the 4th day of January, of the years in which such terms would have ended if this article had not been ratified; and the terms of their successors shall then begin.

"SEC. 2. The Congress shall assemble at least once in every year, and such meeting shall begin at noon on the 4th day of January, unless they shall by law appoint a different day."

The terms of Representatives in Congress elected in November commence under existing law on the following 4th of March, but they do not meet in session until December thereafter, 13 months after their election. A short session, commencing the first Monday in December and ending March 4, follows said election, in which Representatives defeated in November continue to serve for three months; and that short term has been called the "lame-duck" Congress.

To get rid of that condition and to have a Congress responsible to the will of the people this amendment has been proposed. A similar resolution I introduced in 1923.

To delay longer its passage would be a grievous wrong. This will put an end to the "lame-duck" Congress, where Members defeated for reelection in November continue to legislate and are more liable to listen to influence of special interests who seek to defeat legislation desired by the people and to executive influence rather than the expressed will of their constituents. Why wait 13 months after the election to respond to the wishes of the electorate? In every State of the Union and in all other countries of the world no such delay is permitted. Only here in the United States is there such long delay to enact into law the legislation desired by the people. For 10 long years this proposed amendment has been fought and delayed. In no country on earth does there exist such power to defeat and delay the passage of legislation sought to be enacted in the interest of all the people for whose benefit government was created.

The rule of the people is the safety of the Republic. Representative government must be preserved. The power of the people must not be weakened by inaction or long delays. This is the method desired by those who would control the Government and its activities.

Centralization of power in the hands of a few has gone too far and must be ended or the voice of the people will be forgotten. The struggle for control of government and its agencies has been the contest in all ages.

There is no better way to preserve the rights of the masses than to have an early response to the declared will of the people by their elected representatives.

Keep in mind that the preservation of the life of our Republic depends on the will of the people being preserved and not defeated by inaction. Well may the people be anxious to have their expressed will carried into effect without undue delay by their representatives in Congress and in all departments of the Government.

I hope this long-delayed proposed constitutional amendment passed by the Senate time and time again will pass Congress now and be submitted forthwith to the 48 States for ratification.

Mr. RAMSEYER. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. FREAR].

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Chairman, I was wondering, as Winston Churchill sat over in the rear of the House a few minutes ago, what his emotions would be if, in the Parliament of England, he and his colleagues sat around for 13 months after election before they took their seats for legislative work at the next regular session. There, the English people throw out an administration upon their own vote, returning the new Parliament that then comes in and legislates, while we wait 13 months unless called here in extra session.

We are the only Government in the world, so far as I can learn, at least I have not heard of any other, that does that strange thing by virtue of the present provision of the Constitution. I speak of this because the gentleman from New York [Mr. O'CONNOR] says that this is a frivolous proposition—I believe that is the term he used.

Let me read what is stated in the report on that point:

> Under our present system, the old Congress expires on the 4th day of March of the odd years, and the first meeting of the new Congress is on the first Monday of the following December. The newly elected Members have no opportunity for 13 months even to begin to put into effect the policies on which they were elected, unless an extraordinary session of the Congress should be called by the President before that time.

No other government in the world waits 13 months after the representatives come in before they take their seats. And yet the gentleman from New York calls this an unimportant or frivolous resolution. The reasons for an earlier meeting of Congress are obvious. This resolution has been about Congress for 10 years, and yet we are asked by the gentleman from New York why we do not do something in legislation instead of waste time with this resolution. Well, we legislated on the moratorium, and the gentleman did his share, and I congratulate this Democratic side of the House in what they have done to remove the business depression. Both sides of the House have united on every aid bill that has been presented.

We legislated through a $2,000,000,000 credit appropriation, and $125,000,000 for farm relief, all for the same purpose, and yet the gentleman objects because more has not been accomplished in two months' time. I never criticise those who differ with me in bringing in legislation, but why not tell us what other relief bills he wants us to pass, if any are in mind.

We are trying to pass legislation. We are trying to do our full duty, and also to cure by this resolution a manifest defect in our legislative sessions. Is it unimportant to try and cure this situation? That is what this resolution proposes to do.

A gentleman a moment ago came over from your side of the House to our side, urging us to vote for the Longworth amendment. I said to him, "If you do that, it may kill the bill again, as it did the last time." He smiled, and said something to the effect that that would not do much harm. Now, if any gentleman wants to kill the bill, why put on such a limitation. It defeated the bill in conference before; it will probably do so again. We are trying to get the resolution passed by both Houses and sent to the States for their action. We want to get through Congress this resolution.

No gentleman has gotten up on the Republican side and said that without the proposed amendments he would vote against the resolution. In fact, speakers have generally said, if for the amendments, they would support the resolution without them. If it is a good resolution in this shape, irrespective of the amendments, which some Members believe ought to be passed, why not pass the resolution as it is, so that it will not be killed in conference as before?

Mr. BANKHEAD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FREAR. I yield.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Why is it that the House, if its amendment is advisable and necessary on a material matter, should be placed in the attitude by another body of take that or nothing?

Mr. FREAR. That is a fair question. This resolution came originally from the other side. For several years it has come to us from the Senate. We have been placed here in the position of obstructionists by insisting on amendments that Members say are not important to them if the bill will be supported without their addition. I am speaking of the House's action last session and in prior sessions.

We did not offer originally any kind of a resolution. We eventually acted on the Senate resolution, but we put on an amendment that was objectionable to the other body and the conferees could not get together. I do not know who is responsible, nor do I care. The important thought is that 13 months is to continue in the future, during which we are to serve inactive unless something is done with this proposal. I believe the House has as much right to its judgment as the Senate has, but they studied this question over there and prepared the resolution which we have sought to perfect, with the aid of those who first offered the Senate resolution. I say this with some knowledge, because I know that both Chairman Rutherford and Senator NORRIS were practically agreed as to its terms. If we put on that amendment limiting the sessions with the knowledge that we will defeat it, how can we justify that action?

Mr. GIFFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FREAR. I yield.

Mr. GIFFORD. The Senate never has had a vote on this amendment. We do not know.

Mr. FREAR. That is not the question. I am not questioning who is primarily responsible, but why invite another defeat of the resolution?

Now, I have only 10 minutes or I would be glad to yield further.

What is the Longworth amendment? As was suggested, it provides that one of the sessions shall be shortened to May or June. Is that an important limitation to urge? My State legislature has no limitation. Why should it have? Why should Congress bind itself to a fixed time limit? The suggestion is made that in another body they may filibuster and delay things, but is that any justification for an amendment which in effect says we can not control ourselves and can not curb ourselves as to length of sessions whenever the question comes up? We have done so in the past under the 3-day recess until both Houses were agreed. We have always been able to meet that situation. We always have done it.

Yet we are asked to shorten one session arbitrarily to three or four months, however important the legislative situation may be. Why should we insist upon it this time, with certain knowledge that last session it resulted in the defeat of the bill? Now, that is the Longworth amendment. Those of us who are thoroughly interested in the bill vote for it with the belief that it will defeat the bill again if it is amended. If the membership desires to defeat the bill, that is their privilege, of course. Few will vote against this resolution, I take it, if the Longworth amendment is defeated, but its acceptance will prevent the resolution's passage; that will be the probable result.

The other amendment is for the resolution's adoption by the States in seven years. Alabama's legislature meets only once in four years. The others meet in shorter times, but the danger in State action with a matter of this kind is that it is not to the State legislatures a matter of supreme importance. They may not realize the importance of it in a 60-day session which is often the usual term. For that reason we are liable to defeat the resolution by failing to secure adoption by 36 States which must then act upon the resolution within the period of seven years. They may or they may not.

Of course there is the chance that a legislature which meets only once in four years will act upon it; but if they do not, the resolution might by that limitation be defeated.

There is no object in 7 years' limitation for the States to act any more than 9 years or 10 years. I feel that we ought to pass this resolution in the House, if we believe it is right, and we should put it through without hanging amendments onto it that will embarrass its final passage. Any amendments that we place on it may result in the defeat of the resolution. We do not know what will happen 20 years or 50 years from now. We are legislating for the future as far as this resolution is concerned, so either the Longworth amendment or any other may be a source of trouble hereafter. Of course the time for the sessions to begin can be fixed under the resolution, but the resolution is offered to cover the 13 months' delay under the present practice, and it does not need any defense.

Now, I have just been placed on the committee. I regret exceedingly that the gentleman who was the chairman of the committee, Mr. Rutherford, a splendid official, is not here to present the resolution. His death leaves it to Mr. JEFFERS, who has made a fair and complete statement. I repeat, if these amendments are placed on the bill we stand a chance of losing a resolution again that has been worked over for 10 years. We all recognize, I believe, that it is right in principle, and, as I said, we are the only country in the world that has such a legislative situation regularly presented.

In my extension of remarks, I ask permission to put in a tabulation that has been prepared for me, showing the time of legislative service and other data in the different States.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

What price lawmakers?

Mr. GIFFORD. I yield the gentleman from Wisconsin one additional minute that I may ask him a question.

Remarks have been made directed to the point that if these amendments are carried the resolution will be defeated. Is it a fact that if the amendment is not incorporated that we may not get two-thirds vote for the resolution itself?

Mr. FREAR. Every gentleman who has risen in his place, I believe, and made remarks about the resolution has said, if I remember correctly, that he would vote for the resolution whether the amendments were there or not. There may be those who would not.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FREAR. I yield.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Is it not the gentleman's conception that the really material part of this proposed amendment, as far as the "lame-duck" feature of it is concerned, is in making the terms of Members of Congress begin just a few months after election?

Mr. FREAR. Yes.

Mr. BANKHEAD. And the amendment that may be proposed does not go to the very essence of the proposition?

Mr. FREAR. Well, I believe the resolution does and meets the present difficulty it is intended to remedy.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. JEFFERS. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. CARTWRIGHT].

Mr. CARTWRIGHT. Mr. Chairman, as a member of the committee that brought out this resolution, I want to say I have given it some study. While it has been changed a little, it is essentially the Norris amendment. I introduced the same resolution in the last Congress, but, of course, such bills get the name of the chairman. This has passed the Senate several times, and this will be the second time to pass the House. So, after years of fighting and agitation, I believe the "lame-duck" Congresses with legislation by men who have been repudiated by their people is near the end. It should have passed years ago.

Senator NORRIS is to be congratulated for his fight. For a long time he has been crying in the wilderness, but I believe the American people have been with him all the time.

Mr. Chairman, if nothing further were to be accomplished by the amendment than to do away with the absurdity of electing Members of Congress 13 months before they are allowed to become full-fledged Congressmen, that alone would be enough to justify prompt action on our part.

There was some justification for such a provision in the days of the ox cart and tar bucket, when the average rate of travel was 5 or 6 miles an hour; there is none to-day in this wonderful age of scientific achievement and material progress—the age of flying machines and fast automobiles. In times like these it is a travesty on democratic government to elect Representatives to serve the people in the transaction of business of vital importance and then not allow them to begin that service for more than a year. Think of engaging anyone to begin work more than a year hence. Imagine a farmer buying seed or work animals or implements and not be allowed to use them for more than a year. Imagine a bank electing directors to do nothing but watch other directors transact the business for over a year. Fellow Members, nowhere except in the United States are the elected representatives of the people put into a political morgue and kept there for over a year before they can take action. For generations it was our boast that in America we had established a government "of the people, by the people, and for the people." To-day the Government of England and several other governments are far more responsive to the will of the people.

First. This amendment will free Congress of the dead hand of the so-called "lame duck." Of course it is no disgrace to be a "lame duck," but they have been "crippled," their responsibility to the people has been lessened, they have been rejected by the people, yet they often hold the balance of power in both Houses, and so have it in their power to decide matters of the greatest importance to the Nation. It is well known these "lame ducks" have often been influenced by expectations of favors to come from the White House.

Second. It is also during the so-called "lame-duck" session that the filibuster flourishes. It is also during this session that the undemocratic cloture is made use of to jam measures through Congress without adequate debate or understanding.

Mr. WARREN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CARTWRIGHT. I yield.

Mr. WARREN. The gentleman says that this resolution will do away with filibustering. I call the gentleman's attention to the fact that there have been good filibusters and bad filibusters.

Mr. CARTWRIGHT. I admit that. But one of the main purposes of the amendment is to do away with the short session. By so doing it increases by a big percentage the chances of legislation being given the fullest consideration and being decided by representatives who are fresh from the people and who look directly to the people and nowhere else for their reward.

Third. Under this amendment each Congress would organize itself. At present the dying Congress provides by caucuses the offices and organization for the newly elected Congress. A dead Congress seeks to control the machinery of a Congress that is yet to come into being. The proposed amendment would put a stop to that undemocratic practice.

Fourth. This resolution should pass because it has received the approval of the American Bar Association and of a great many farm, labor, and women's organizations. The press throughout the whole country is for it. I do not know of anybody or group that is openly against it, and I believe the States will vote a ratification of the proposed constitutional amendment at the first opportunity. [Applause.]

Mr. JEFFERS. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. MONTAGUE]. [Applause.]

Mr. MONTAGUE. Mr. Chairman, I have never seen the necessity of this legislation. I have felt that to embark upon amending the Constitution in order to meet the presidential aspect of this resolution was too nebulous and too obscure and might involve us in more difficulties than we are now in. I doubted our wisdom and capacity to bring in any amendment that would meet the difficulties that nobody can foresee, but which will develop in time in connection with the election of a President if it should fall into this House. But can not I say, as some consolation to those with whom I agree on this subject, that we have not been hurt by the present practice? What President has this House elected, "lame-duck" Congresses or brand new Congresses? Was not Thomas Jefferson elected by a "lame-duck" Congress? Is there any large public sentiment in America which regrets that election? Was not John Quincy Adams elected by a "lame-duck" Congress? Our Republican friends, I am sure, do not regret the election of Mr. Jefferson or Mr. Adams. [Applause.]

I now leave that aspect of it, with the repetition, if you please, that the game is not worth the candle; that a constitutional amendment is too big a weapon to wield in order to achieve the small results contemplated by this resolution.

Let us go back a bit. What is the source of this legislation? What is the cause of this legislation? I think "lame-duck Members" is a capitalistic terminology to destroy the usefulness of the legislative branch of our Government, which is the desire of some people. It is unfortunate that the election of Members and the service of Members should be at times so far separated. I do not undertake to justify that; but if that is the trouble to be cured, I ask you why go to a constitutional amendment to remedy it? Why have we stood here all these years, with a constitutional principle and provision in the existing legislative power for immediate exercise? We have an existing concrete remedy in the Constitution itself.

I will read the section of the Constitution which supports this contention:

The Congress shall assemble at least once in every year, and such meeting shall be on the first Monday in December, unless they shall by law appoint a different day.

That is as plain as a pikestaff. That is as plain as your hand before your eyes. Having that power why do we not exercise it rather than to pursue the circuitous route of a constitutional amendment in order to cure some imaginary difficulties, especially as relating to the presidential election?

Mr. TILSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONTAGUE. Yes.

Mr. TILSON. As a matter of fact, during the period immediately following the Civil War did not the Congress, by statute, appoint the 4th of March, or soon thereafter, for the meeting of each succeeding Congress, and for about six years this was the law, until the passions of the Civil War had somewhat cooled, when the law was repealed and Congress went back to the original provision of the Constitution regarding the meetings of Congress, from which no subsequent Congress has departed?

Mr. MONTAGUE. I thank the gentleman for the suggestion. I did not intend to go into any complete history of this. However, I couple his suggestion with the observation that war, civil or otherwise, always wrenches governments out of their sockets, and it takes a long time to outlive the evils that war brings upon us. I say we now have this power. If I had my own way I would not rush a Congress here immediately upon its election. I am not afraid of the words "cooling time." I would bring them quicker than now provided for, but I would give them some time to make physical preparations to come here to discharge their duties, and I would give them some time to get free of the atmosphere of partisanship, which is the most insidious disease any of us possesses, and those who possess it most think they possess it least. [Applause.]

Mr. GIFFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONTAGUE. Yes.

Mr. GIFFORD. The gentleman says that this could be done by law rather than by constitutional methods, but does not the gentleman recognize that we could not well get rid of the "lame-duck" session, at which the votes for a President might be cast, except through this constitutional provision?

Mr. MONTAGUE. If the gentleman will recall, I stated that the only instances in which we did not get rid of them we elected Jefferson and John Quincy Adams.

Mr. PARSONS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONTAGUE. Yes.

Mr. PARSONS. Under the present arrangement, could the Congress enact legislation that would permit the Members elect to elect a President and the Members elect of the Senate to elect a Vice President, in case the President elect or the Vice President elect should become disqualified in any way?

Mr. MONTAGUE. I have not thought of that sufficiently or maturely to give the gentleman an opinion.

Mr. PARSONS. That is the only virtue or the only advantage in this proposition.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I think so; but, as I say, I think that is very attenuated and very negligible, and the instances we have had have not proved harmful but have proved beneficial to the American people.

Now, about Congress. I have been here a good, long while. I have seen some of the most eminent men go. We seem to think that if a man is defeated for Congress he is no longer fit for public service or anything else; that he has suffered some blast to his reputation, and he is suddenly inefficient and incompetent to discharge any public trust. This is a violent assumption and the record is full, and the proof is ample, to the contrary. Representative William McKinley was a "lame-duck" and came back to this Capital as President of the United States [applause], and I might name many others who have come back to this Capital, not as President, but have come back to the Senate or back to the House again or to the Cabinet or some other high position.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Champ Clark was a "lame-duck," I will remind my friend.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Yes; Abraham Lincoln was, also.

I have observed some of these men in the House after their defeat, and I ask you to remember this if you forget everything else I may say. They have one factor of legislative equipment; they are free from the hope of reward or the fear of punishment. [Applause.] They live, I repeat, in an atmosphere of legislative calm. They are free and independent legislators, and it is well for us to have a small class of men of this character in this House who after the storm of battle will stand up and vote with the future not in view.

Mr. LOZIER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONTAGUE. Yes.

Mr. LOZIER. Admitting the high character of some "lame-duck" Representatives, does the gentleman think it is a sound and wholesome policy for a man who has been repudiated by his constituents to come back and enact legislation against their will—is that Americanism?

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. JEFFERS. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman five additional minutes.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Suppose a man is defeated in the primary? Do you think we should get rid of him and never allow him to run for office again?

Mr. LOZIER. That is not the question.

Mr. MONTAGUE. The same principle is involved.

Mr. LOZIER. Does the gentleman think it is Americanism, Democracy, or Republicanism to allow a man who has been rejected at the polls, and his policies repudiated, to come back and have 13 or 14 months' time in which to legislate and to put into effect those same policies?

Mr. MONTAGUE. I would not give him 13 or 14 months.

Mr. LOZIER. Well, he has them now.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I do not say that I would not make a change, but I say we have ample power now to change that.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Will the distinguished gentleman from Virginia yield?

Mr. MONTAGUE. For a question; yes.

Mr. O'CONNOR. If the argument of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. LOZIER] were carried to its logical conclusion, after election day, on the first Tuesday after the first Monday in November, the President should not be entitled to function any more. That is the gentleman's theory.

Mr. LOZIER. The President can not enact legislation.

Mr. O'CONNOR. The theory is that because a man is defeated in election he is going to sacrifice his Government is not good Americanism either.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I ask now not to be interrupted until I have finished this thought. I would bring, if you please, the legislators elect into the discharge of their duties sooner than they now come, but I am simply arguing that it is a mere bugaboo to say that what we have been doing all these years will now suddenly destroy the country, and I have been trying to emphasize the fact that when men are free from any ulterior consideration, if they have any patriotism or any character whatever—and many men have been defeated who had as much patriotism and as much character as those who were not defeated—these men are then freer to exercise their attributes of statesmanship and to exercise their principles of patriotism, which I am sure they possess, than many of us who stand here day by day crowded with letters, oppressed with propaganda, hardly able to find 10 uninterrupted minutes in any day in which to study any governmental subject, with department work which makes almost every Representative a slave, with all the modern appliances of American ingenuity and mechanism, if you please—telegraph, telephone, and what not—to press and press and drive us on to a conclusion, which sometimes, if we were independent, we know we would not do. So I have seen some of these so-called "lame-ducks," if I may repeat an expression which I did not intend to use when I did use it, I have seen them run farther and fly farther than they did before they ever were injured. [Laughter and applause.]

I desire to pay my great respect to the gentlemen who have brought forward this bill; they have labored diligently, intelligently, and ably, and the House, I am sure, gives full credit to them.

Now, one thing further. My esteemed friend from Wisconsin [Mr. FREAR] made some comparisons. There is no possible analogy between this system and the English system. This is to save the President in an emergency. Their Government does not have a President. They have one ruler in the form of a King.

Their whole system for years has been a cabinet system, picked from a legislative body. If it is not sustained by the house or the chamber or the parliamentary institution under which they function, they go out and enter upon another election. It is pretty near a democracy.

After the revolution in the seventeenth century, they came out a limited monarchy. After our Revolution in the eighteenth century we came out a limited democracy.

Mr. FREAR. If the gentleman will pardon me, I had reference to the parliamentary situation.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I appreciate that; but it is not analogous to the proposition that now confronts the House. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. GIFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. GOSS].

Mr. GOSS. Mr. Chairman, I had not intended to speak on the bill to-day, but inasmuch as so much has been said about the Longworth amendment I want to take time to read it. It is as follows:

SEC. 2. The Congress shall assemble at least once in every year. In each odd-numbered year such meeting shall begin at noon on the 4th day of January, unless they shall by law provide a different day. In each even-numbered year such meeting shall be on the 4th day of January, and the session shall not continue after noon on the 4th day of May.

I remember when the late Speaker came down into the well of the House and said that he desired to call our attention to what in his mind was a fundamental objection to the bill, which is the same bill we have to-day, and in the same form. This fundamental objection was that this would allow the Congress to be in perpetual session, and that he felt the Congressmen should be able to go home and have some four months to prepare for the coming election.

That is my own feeling. I want to see this amendment adopted. It is very simple. I happen to be on a committee where other members do not want to report out a bill because a gentleman at the other end of the capital does not want it to come out in that way.

This same gentleman is telling us, in the bill sent over here for us to consider, that he does not want this House to have its way in this matter.

I think it is high time that the House should act independently and do what it wishes in the consideration of these matters regardless of what the other body may do with the legislation. In my judgment, we ought not to pass this bill without the amendment, and thus become subservient to the Senate. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I yield back the remainder of my time.

Mr. GIFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CLANCY].

Mr. CLANCY. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from New York [Mr. O'CONNOR], during the discussion of the rule, reminded the House of its pressing duty to always keep in mind the relief of unemployment and the distressed people of this country. That precipitated a rather humorous debate between, among others, "the two gentlemen from Harlem,"—Mr. GAVAGAN and Mr. LAGUARDIA—but they did not inform the House of the all-important question, and we are still waiting to hear which of those gentlemen represents the two famous Americans—"Amos 'n' Andy," of Harlem. Of course, we Members of Congress are but doctors or physicians in taking care of or curing the country. We can give the people medicine—that is, a law—but the vitality of the patients—the people of the country—and their virility are the main things. In the last analysis the people must help themselves.

To-day has been a rather noteworthy day on the floor of this House in that Mr. Winston Churchill, one of the strong men in the World War and one who helped England to go through the postwar period, has been on the floor of the House. We also had a brilliant oration on Abraham Lincoln by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CHIPERFIELD], and he told us that Lincoln talked faith and courage as Henry Ford does to-day.

I think in view of these developments and the fact we are discussing a change in the model of our laws, the Constitution of the United States, it is pertinent to announce that the newspapers of the country in prominent headlines to-day call attention to precedents in changing models, and to the fact that the foremost American business man, Henry Ford, has enlisted on a vast business program and a crusade to help cure this depression which the gentleman from New York has brought to our attention.

Mr. Ford is gambling on better times by getting out a new model 8 car.

The whole automobile industry itself was already enlisted in a great gamble. It is the only industry to-day in the United States that dares to teach and preach and act optimism. Other industries are yelling for Government aid for money or for tariffs, and so forth.

A change in 218 auto models means the expenditure of millions of dollars for machinery alone, in the junking of practically new machinery and installing still newer machinery.

Wall Street has been perked up by this news that was given to the country yesterday by Henry Ford, on the birthday anniversary of his old friend, Thomas Edison, for Wall Street sees great aid to labor, to raw materials, and to other industries. Mr. Ford, himself quite an aged man, has been working with his coat and vest off and in his shirt sleeves for several months to get out his new model.

This means much to my State but also much to the whole 48 States in which there are subsidiary agencies, factories, and branches. The news is so great and wonderful that it should give some satisfaction to anxious Members of the House, because not only is the Ford Co. putting on tens of thousands of workmen and buying hundreds of millions of dollars' worth of raw material, but also the Hudson, the Packard, the Graham-Paige, the Hupp, the Chevrolet, and other General Motors companies are employing many more men and buying vast quantities of steel, lumber, glass, rubber, cloth, copper, and so forth.

About two years ago the President called in the leaders of the automotive industry and told them that they represented the key industry of the country, and if they started work on a great scale all the country would benefit and a general revival would result.

They told the President that their surveys indicated to them that the people could not buy the cars, and that they would lose a great deal of money if they did turn their factory wheels on a large scale. They turned them, nevertheless, as a patriotic measure, on the insistence of the President, and they took losses of millions and millions of dollars.

But now they are riding forth majestically again on another great gamble.

Mr. Ford has asked those who control the raw materials not to raise the prices of the raw materials to the manufacturers, because that will throttle the patriotic effort. We, as Members of Congress, were also incidentally asked by these men and by Mr. Ford's own representative a couple of weeks ago to give the auto industry a chance to get out of the "red" and aid all industry without a crushing handicap of additional sales taxes. The Ways and Means Committee was implored not to place upon them an increased burden of taxation which would throttle their glorious endeavor, for the industry is already overtaxed. May the House have mercy, for mercy is wisdom in this case.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. GIFFORD. Mr. Chairman, several members of the committee have asked if this debate would continue after to-day. I would like to ask the chairman or anyone in charge when this debate is supposed to continue?

Mr. JEFFERS. It will go on to-morrow, and the bill is supposed to be finished to-morrow up to the point of a vote. That is the agreement, as I understand it. Debate is continued, and the vote is to be taken on Tuesday.

Mr. GIFFORD. May I inquire about what time we intend to close the debate to-day?

Mr. JEFFERS. I think all gentlemen who have asked for time and who are here present should be given an opportunity to speak to-day.

Mr. GIFFORD. I suppose the gentleman would be willing to have an understanding that we would not sit longer than 5 o'clock?

Mr. JEFFERS. As a matter of fact, the leadership very much desire to have general debate finished to-day, if possible, and we will run along as long as it is necessary to conclude that.

Mr. GOSS. When does the gentleman expect to go under the 5-minute rule?

Mr. JEFFERS. To-morrow, as soon as we arrive at that point.

Mr. GOSS. There may be a vote if there was a motion made to recommit.

Mr. JEFFERS. Well, we will only go to the previous question to-morrow afternoon.

Mr. HASTINGS. When will the three hours' general debate provided under the rule expire?

Mr. GIFFORD. That would take us until after 6 o'clock.

Mr. JEFFERS. Mr. Chairman, we are going along out of order now.

I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. GLOVER].

Mr. GLOVER. Mr. Chairman, ladies and gentlemen, we have before us to-day one of the most important questions that this Congress will be called upon to consider. There is a Senate joint resolution, No. 14, by Senator NORRIS proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States and fixing the commencement of the terms of the President, Vice President, and Members of Congress, and also fixing the time of the assembling of Congress.

It was my privilege to serve on the Committee on Election of President, Vice President, and Representatives in Congress for the first two years of my service in Congress, and we had before us this proposed amendment to the Constitution of the United States and conducted hearings and drafted in practically the identical words contained in this proposed substituted amendment the amendment that is proposed to be adopted in lieu of the Senate joint resolution.

I heartily agree with the sentiment expressed by many on the floor of this House and in the press that the Constitution of the United States should be amended only when it became absolutely necessary for the same. The necessity for the change as proposed in this amendment to the Constitution is so plain and urgent that there should not be any opposition to it whatever on the floor of this House.

Practically this identical joint resolution was passed by the House in its last session with one amendment, known as the Longworth amendment, which limited the short term of Congress to four months. I supported that amendment because I thought that there should be a limit of time placed on the short session. But I am going to support this resolution without any amendment to it in order that there may be no question of it being accepted by the other body.

Section 1 provides:

> The terms of the President and Vice President shall end at noon on the 24th day of January, and the terms of Senators and Representatives at noon on the 4th day of January, of the years in which such terms would have ended if this article had not been ratified, and the terms of their successors shall then begin.

Under the law that we have now we meet on the first Monday in December, and the day fixed for adjournment by the Constitution is fixed as March 4 for the short session, and by the time the Congress is organized the Christmas holidays are on, and then there is usually an adjournment of two weeks, and there is practically nothing done by Congress until they reconvene after the holidays in January. So this would eliminate that expense of holding Congress in session during the time that very little or nothing is usually accomplished.

Beginning with the 4th day of January Congress will have ample time for the completion of all its work, and Congress could easily discharge all of its duties by the 1st of June unless some emergency should arise that would require a longer term.

Section 2 provides as follows:

> The Congress shall assemble at least once in every year, and such meeting shall begin at noon on the 4th day of January, unless they shall by law appoint a different day.

Under this provision of the Constitution the Congress would not be required to forever meet on the 4th of January, but could, if after discussion thought wise, change the time of meeting to a different day in the year.

As the Constitution now is the meeting day is fixed by the Constitution and Congress can not change it.

Section 3 provides as follows:

> If the President elect dies, then the Vice President elect shall become President. If a President is not chosen before the time fixed for the beginning of his term, or if the President elect fails to qualify, then the Vice President elect shall act as President until a President has qualified; and the Congress may by law provide for the case where neither a President elect nor a Vice President elect has qualified, declaring who shall then act as President, or the manner in which a qualified person shall be selected, and such parson shall act accordingly until a President or Vice President has qualified.

This provision should have always been in our Constitution. When this amendment is adopted Congress could then pass an act that would clarify this situation and would provide who shall act as President in a case of this kind.

Section 4 provides:

> The Congress may by law provide for the case of the death of any of the persons from whom the House of Representatives may choose a President whenever the right of choice devolves upon them and for the case of the death of any of the persons from whom the Senate may choose a Vice President whenever the right of choice devolves upon them.

When this amendment to the Constitution is adopted, then Congress can provide by an act of Congress who shall be selected in cases of this kind and which might arise at any time.

The last section, section 5, simply provides that sections 1 and 2 shall take effect on the 30th day of November of the year following the year in which the article is ratified.

This amendment has been freely referred to by the press and others as the "lame-duck amendment." Under the present Constitution when a Representative in Congress is elected, unless there is a special session called by the President, about 13 months elapse before he can act for his people who elected him to represent them in Congress. Conditions of this kind should never have existed. When people elect their Representative to Congress on important issues, the issues should be considered at the earliest possible moment in order that these issues may be enacted into law by Congress, if Congress thinks wise to do so. At least the people are entitled to hearings at the earliest possible time.

As stated by the committee in its report, a serious emergency would exist in the event of the death of the President elect, or both the President elect and Vice President elect, for the present Constitution contains no applicable provision, and the following situations are possible:

(1) A party nominee may die before the November elections.
(2) A party nominee may die after the November elections and before the electors vote.
(3) The President elect may die after the electors vote and before the votes are counted.
(4) If the election of the President is thrown into the House, one or more of the three highest may die before the House chooses.
(5) The President elect may die before the date fixed for the beginning of his term.
(6) The Vice President elect may die.
(7) If the election of the Vice President is thrown into the Senate, one or both of the two highest may die before the Senate chooses.
(8) Both the President elect and the Vice President elect may die.

When this proposed constitutional amendment is adopted by Congress and ratified by the States every emergency that could arise could be taken care of by act of Congress.

It is my hope that this constitutional amendment may receive the unanimous indorsement of this Congress. [Applause.]

Mr. GIFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STOKES].

Mr. STOKES. Mr. Chairman, on this anniversary of the birth of Abraham Lincoln, who has justly been called the most American of all Americans, it is a pleasure to briefly review a few of his words and catch the trend of his thoughts, for his great achievements have filled with admiration not only America but the entire civilized world.

He was a Member of this House for two years and during the term made numerous speeches on various topics, which he illustrated with humorous stories, which kept the House in roars of laughter.

He was a deep student of the works of the founder of our country and of those principles which were embodied in the Declaration of Independence and the Constitution.

He made it his duty to fight with all his might against anything he believed to be an infringement of the blessings of liberty as stated in the Declaration of Independence or of these self-evident truths—that all men are created equal and that they are endowed by their Creator with certain inalienable rights—life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness.

On his way from Springfield to Washington to assume his duties as President, he was invited by the citizens of Philadelphia to raise the flag of the United States over old Independence Hall. On this occasion he said:

I have never had a feeling, politically, that did not spring from the sentiments embodied in the Declaration of Independence. I have often pondered over the dangers which were incurred by the men who assembled here and framed and adopted that declaration. I have pondered over the toils that were endured by the officers and soldiers of the Army who achieved that independence.

I have often inquired of myself what great principle or idea it was that kept this Confederacy so long together. It was not the mere matter of separation of the Colonies from the motherland, but that sentiment in the Declaration of Independence which gave liberty, not alone to the people of this country, but hope to all the world, for all future time. It was that which gave promise that in due time the weight would be lifted from the shoulders of all men and that all should have an equal chance. This is the sentiment embodied in the Declaration of Independence.

President Lincoln wisely called about him the best minds that were available in the country, among whom were Seward; Chase, whom he later appointed Chief Justice; and Stanton; most of whom were his political enemies, but he always put the Nation's interest before his own feelings.

While he was a lawyer by profession, he became deeply interested in politics and the important questions of the day.

It was in this field that he made his great impression on the people of the State of Illinois.

It was his reputation for rugged honesty, courage, intelligence, patience, perseverance, and fair play, combined with a great capacity for hard work, which so effectively inspired the people of his State to present his name as a candidate for President of the Republican Party in 1860. He was previously comparatively unknown, but he had engaged in a series of debates with Senator Douglas in 1858, which brought him prominently before the country.

At 51 years of age he found himself elected President of the Republic.

In the words of Emerson—

He grew according to the need; his mind mastered the problem of the day; and as the problem grew, so did his comprehension of it. In the war there was no place for holiday magistrate nor fair-weather sailor. The new pilot was hurried to the helm in a tornado. In four years—four years of battle days—his endurance, his fertility of resource, his magnanimity were sorely tried and never found wanting. There, by his courage, his justice, his even temper, his fertile counsel, his humanity, he stood a heroic figure in the center of a heroic epoch.

He had plenty of common sense, and desired just as we do to-day to reduce expenses of government, as illustrated by the following story: He was shown a telegram from the War Department to the effect that the southern army had captured a brigadier general and 12 Army mules. "I don't mind the brigadier general," he said. "I can replace him in five minutes, but those Army mules cost the Government $200 apiece."

Many are the stories that are told of his wit, humor, and kindly sarcasm. But I will recall only one to-day about General Grant, who always found plenty of critics to urge the President to oust him from his command. They repeated the gossip that General Grant drank.

"What does he drink," said the President.

"Whisky, of course," was the reply.

"Just find out what brand he uses and I will send a barrel to each of my other generals," answered the President.

Mr. Choate said:

He led public opinion, but did not march so far in advance of it as to fail of its effective support in every great emergency.

He knew the heart and thought of the people as no man not in constant and absolute sympathy with them could have known it, and so holding their confidence he triumphed through and with them.

The rough backwoodsman, who had never seen the inside of a university, became in the end the master of the finest literary style.

Loyal, strong, and brave,
Type of the plan,
Great nature offers
When God builds a man;
Great fame, great aim, great soul were thine,
A chosen vessel for a task divine.

[Applause.]

Mr. JEFFERS. Mr. Chairman, before yielding further time I wish to state that we are anxious to finish the debate on the pending measure this afternoon. So far as this side of the House is concerned, we have all our time allotted and the gentlemen are here to use it. I would advise the ranking minority Member to let his speakers know about this, so if they are not present at this moment they can be advised that they must be here so that we may finish the debate this afternoon if possible.

Mr. GIFFORD. Mr. Chairman, in reply to the gentleman I will say that I have requests for the full amount of time. One Member is sick and two other Members insist on going on to-morrow morning and have informed me they will doubt the presence of a quorum if it is insisted that they go on now. In any event, we have got to stay here until 6 o'clock if we use up all the time. I have other speakers that can use the time.

Mr. RAMSEYER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. GIFFORD. I yield.

Mr. RAMSEYER. There are some proposals of a serious nature that ought to be discussed, and they ought to be discussed when there are more Members here. The gentleman, of course, knows that I shall endeavor to incorporate an amendment known as section 6 in the concurrent resolution that passed last year. Here we are with only a few dozen Members present. It seems to me that when a constitutional amendment is up for consideration we ought to have the Members here, and it was thought that some of the time for general debate would be saved for to-morrow and we could then have plenty of time to consider the few amendments in an orderly way.

With respect to making speeches for the RECORD, I am not interested. When time is allotted to me I want to make an argument to the membership of the House on an important amendment.

Mr. JEFFERS. I might suggest to the gentleman that if we finish general debate this afternoon we will have a better opportunity for discussion under the 5-minute rule to-morrow, whereas if we consume time to-morrow in general debate that will cut down our time under the 5-minute rule.

Mr. RAMSEYER. Well, it will not be a lot of time. It will probably be 40 or 50 minutes to finish the general debate, and then the Members will be here and it will just save that much time under the 5-minute rule.

Mr. JEFFERS. Forty or fifty minutes at the beginning of the day usually runs into an hour or so. I think it would be wise to finish general debate this afternoon, which will give us an entire afternoon to-morrow for consideration and discussion under the 5-minute rule, when amendments can be offered.

Mr. LOZIER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JEFFERS. Yes; certainly I yield to my colleague.

Mr. LOZIER. I may say that I recognize that the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. RAMSEYER] has an important amendment, an amendment which I think should be presented when we have as full a membership of the House as possible here. May I make this suggestion? I think it will be the disposition of the majority, when the gentleman comes to offer his amendment, to have sufficient time, and I am quite sure the House will give him ample time to present his amendment and not hold the gentleman down to the rigid requirements of the 5-minute rule.

Mr. JEFFERS. Why, yes, of course; I shall assist the gentleman along that line. Now, Mr. Chairman, at this time I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. TAYLOR].

Mr. RAMSEYER. Does the gentleman think we ought to go on with general debate with the few Members we have here now?

Mr. JEFFERS. I intend to give to the gentlemen who are here present and who have patiently waited for their time to speak the opportunity to be heard.

Mr. JEFFERS. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. NORTON].

Mr. NORTON. Mr. Chairman, ladies and gentlemen of the House, when a resolution similar to the pending Norris resolution was being considered by the House four years ago, I had the privilege, as a member of the committee which had framed the resolution, to speak in its support on the floor of this House. I am equally grateful for the opportunity now afforded to urge favorable consideration of this proposed constitutional amendment.

It is easy to understand the causes which were mainly responsible in the writing of the constitutional provision which this measure seeks to amend. Since conditions have very materially changed since that time, those causes no longer exist. Then why continue a provision of the Constitution which is not in harmony with the conditions and requirements as we find them to-day? To be more specific, if we did not have our modern means of communication, if we had no telegraphs, no telephones, no radios, and no fast-mail service, we would be compelled to wait, as they were in those days, for weeks before the result of an election in one part of the country could be known in another part thereof. As then, it would take considerable time to gather the election returns in order to determine the result. Even after the result had been ascertained, it would take time for that information to become generally known throughout the country. If conditions were now what they were 145 years ago, we would not have our present system of good roads, but would have roads that would be almost impassable; there would be no automobiles, no train service, no airplanes, and we would be compelled to rely on the stagecoach and the saddle horse for our travel. Under such conditions it would take weeks, and perhaps months, even after the result of the election had been learned, before the Congress could assemble and become organized.

Another most important change has been made in our Constitution which affects this matter. Following the ratification of the Constitution, and in fact until quite recently, the United States Senators were elected by the legislatures of the various States. The State legislature did not meet until in January, and since contests often developed, it was considerably later than that before selections were announced. Senators so elected could not have attended a session of Congress convening in the month of January.

Nor have we a right to say, or even to assume that the framers of the Constitution would not have decided, as we now propose, if they could have foreseen developments in the years to follow. I am not one of those who believe that since the work of the Constitutional Convention was so well done, we should not tamper with the Constitution; that we should refrain from making changes for fear that we might err in our efforts. Apparently that was not the viewpoint of those who framed the Constitution, for they provided ways of amending it. Although they could not possibly have foreseen the tremendous changes which time has wrought, they were wise men who realized that the changing conditions of the years to come would require changes in the fundamental law of the land. It must also be remembered that the Constitution was, at least in some of its provisions, the result of compromises. Then as now men differed in their viewpoints with reference to government.

Apparently that fundamental difference of viewpoint, wherein some of our people believe that government exists for the benefit of the privileged few who alone are qualified to decide the policy to be pursued, while others cling to the view that government exists for service to the masses and that the people as a whole are competent to govern themselves, has always existed. That difference of viewpoint is in evidence in various debates of the constitutional convention; it exists to-day. Those who believed in popular government, in the rule of the masses, then as now maintained that even though the people in the exercise of their rights might make mistakes, they had a fundamental right to do so, for in that way alone could they best learn the functions of government and, profiting by their mistakes, more wisely direct the course their government should pursue.

However that may be, our country has adopted 19 amendments in the manner provided for such changes by the Federal Constitution since its adoption. Five additional amendments, I believe, have been submitted by Congress which have not been ratified by a sufficient number of States to become a part of the Constitution. Of the 19 amendments ratified, the first 10 were submitted by the first session of the first Congress. In fact, several of the Colonies had ratified the Constitution with the distinct understanding that the first session of the first Congress would submit those 10 amendments, which since have become known as the "bill of rights."

Therefore, in the last 145 years the Congress has submitted, and the required number of States have ratified, only nine additional amendments to the Constitution. It has been with caution that Congress has submitted amendments, and it has been with equal caution that the legislatures of the various States have ratified them. That is as it should be. But there may be times when that caution may be carried too far, when the exercise of it may defeat the will of the people and prevent changes which the people demand. To further delay the submission of the pending resolution would, as I view it, be a case of that kind.

What are some of the benefits to be realized in the event of the submission and ratification of the pending resolution? In the first place, it would provide for the assembling of the Congress and the inauguration of the President and Vice President in January following their election. The amendment to the resolution which is proposed by the House committee would also provide for the election of a President in certain emergencies. In the brief period of time which has been allotted me I shall speak only with reference to that part of the resolution which provides for the elimination of the so-called "lame-duck" session of Congress. Nor shall I attempt to speak of all advantages to be realized, but only those which appear to be of the greatest importance.

The first result would be the taking over of the offices by those chosen in the preceding election. As we say, they would be fresh from the people. The result of the election and the issues discussed therein would be fresh in their minds, and they would be anxious to carry out the promises which they had made to the people in the course of the campaign. To this there are those who would reply that we need a cooling-off period, so that the actions of the Congress may not be too hasty or ill-advised. Apparently that was not the view of the framers of the Constitution, for they provided 2-year terms for the Representatives. In that way each Member is compelled to return frequently for further indorsement and instructions. Besides, I fear that the country suffers more from too much, rather than too little, cooling-off. As everyone knows, there are forces constantly at work in an effort to cool the ardor and the enthusiasm of the people's Representatives in Congress, and for that reason it is only logical to assume that the greater the delay the less apt becomes the Member to correctly register his vote in keeping with the wishes and interests of his constituents and the more apt will he be to register the wishes, if not the demands, of these cooling-off influences.

In answer to those who may be fearful lest sufficient check is not provided, I need only to point to the fact that we have so much check now that the enactment of legislation in the interest of the great masses seems at times almost impossible. What greater check can be needed than that which is provided in our two branches of Congress, each checking the other, and the Chief Executive checking them both. If this does not provide a sufficient check, how can certain other nations with a single legislative branch of government, and in which the representatives of the people meet almost immediately after election to administer the affairs of government, function with safety to their people?

A further objection to the present arrangement is to be found in the fact that the new Member of Congress is not generally sworn in until 13 months after his election. Almost immediately thereafter he finds himself in the midst of a campaign for renomination. Up to that time he has had insufficient time to carry out the promises which he has made to his constituents, and but little opportunity to demonstrate his capabilities in other respects. Likewise the people whom he has been chosen to represent have not had a proper chance to properly weigh his qualifications, so as to know whether he comes up to their expectations, before they are called upon to vote for or against his renomination. In such an emergency a new Member of Congress must choose between two alternatives, either that of making a thorough and aggressive campaign, or of remaining on the job, giving the best service of which he is capable, and permitting the campaign to take care of itself. If this amendment should become a part of our Federal Constitution, newly elected Members of Congress would in the future have the necessary time to demonstrate their capabilities and properly register their views with reference to legislative matters before engaging in another campaign, and their constituents would likewise have time to better judge their qualifications.

The third point which I desire to stress, and the one which has probably been discussed more than any other in connection with this proposal, involves the present situation wherein a defeated Member of Congress continues to serve during the short session. It is not fair to him to ridicule his position or his activities, or to merely refer to him as a "lame duck," since he is not to blame for the situation. He does not only have the right but it is his solemn duty and responsibility to continue his service to the best of his ability in his capacity as a Member. However handicapped and humiliated he may be in his public efforts following his defeat, his is not the fault. Neither can the blame be placed upon the people of the Nation, since the sentiment for this proposed constitutional change is overwhelmingly favorable and has been so for a considerable length of time. Nor can it be charged to the State legislatures, since these bodies have not been given an opportunity to ratify the proposed change, which I have every reason to believe nearly all of them favor. The blame then, if such there be, must rest with the Congress for its failure to act sooner in this very important matter.

But even if the defeated candidate is not at fault the present situation is a most undesirable one. During the campaign the Member who has been a candidate for reelection may have advocated certain legislation which after his defeat he is in a position to continue to support, contrary to the verdict and the wishes of his people. Furthermore, in the event of an emergency wherein the election of a President is thrown into the House of Representatives, he would be in a position to vote for a minority candidate, likewise contrary to the verdict of his constituents. It has been charged at times that a defeated Member of Congress is often influenced in his voting through some promise of an appointment which he is later to receive. Whether that is true or not, the present provision makes such a charge and such an arrangement possible, and the opportunity therefor should be removed through a change in the Constitution.

Finally, the proposed change would result in the elimination of the short session of Congress. In this connection I wish to say that I am not in favor of providing for another short session by fixing a definite date for the adjournment of the last session of any given Congress. To do that would be to continue a situation which this proposal seeks to end. If the last session of a Congress, one in which the regular appropriation measures must be considered, is made a short session by constitutional limitation many of the evils now complained of in connection with the present short session would be permitted to continue. I refer in particular to the opportunity for filibustering in such sessions of Congress. Not only that, but a short session of Congress makes impossible the proper consideration of appropriation measures, involving the expenditures of not only millions but billions of dollars. Besides, in the rush which naturally follows, many important measures are sidetracked, while others, less desirable, are given approval and are passed. It is my view that Congress should be left to be its own judge as to the length of each session during the 2-year period of its existence.

In conclusion may I ask what opposition is there to the approval and submission of this proposal? Why has necessary action relative thereto been so long delayed? Many of my constituents have expressed themselves as being favorable to it, and none have spoken in opposition. I assume that has been the experience of many, and perhaps nearly all of the other Members. As to indorsements, the press of the country is known to be overwhelmingly in favor of the proposed change. The American Bar Association has indorsed it. Business and professional men are everywhere favorable to it, and the same is true of leading farm organizations and likewise true of the American Federation of Labor. The proposal has received the approval of the League of Women Voters, women's clubs, and many other women's organizations. Many are they who are enthusiastic supporters of the proposal.

It does seem strange that a change which everyone seems to want, no one seems to be able to bring about. Not a single civilized nation in the world permits of a similar situation, and not a single State in the Union has such an arrangement with reference to the assembling of its legislative body. As I view it, the change would be in the interest of a more efficient, a more direct, and a more representative administration of governmental affairs. It would bring the Constitution into harmony with the present conditions and requirements of our times. I most earnestly hope that the resolution may be approved and submitted by this Congress; that it will be ratified at an early date by the legislatures in the required number of States so that it may become a part of the fundamental law of the land. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. GIFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. BLACK].

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Chairman, this is an important era in the life of parliamentary governments. Europe is a civic laboratory testing out new theories of government, but time only will tell their worth.

Our representative system has been workable for our conditions and our people. Lately it has been under attack. Some writers of responsibility advocate the adoption of one of the many European systems. We, to protect a system we believe in, should remove the point of proper attacks. The hold-over Congressmen have been an inspiration to criticism. Their very presence, after repudiation, is a denial of representation. It would be wise for the confidence we seek that we change our times of meeting. The expression of the people at the polls as readily as possible should be translated into official action. The Congress has done well, no matter which political party has controlled its deliberations, but it can be more immediately responsive to the public will by this amendment.

After all, a Congressman, "lame-duck" or live, is human. Some will doubt this. The "lame-duck," anxious for his future, will be more amenable to Executive suggestions than he might otherwise be.

Congress, as the legislative body, has suffered by contrast with the Executive head of the Government. It is quite natural, because of the manner in which we proceed, that that should be. A bill comes into Congress; it goes to a committee; it is deliberated upon; hearings are held; the press carries stories about the hearings and there is editorial reaction. The bill goes to the White House or to the governor's office, as may be, in the case of a State legislature, and the executive head has had the benefit of the debates in the legislative branch, the hearings, the editorial reaction, and all the proceedings, and he frames his message of approval or disapproval.

He is able to give out a statement which has been carefully prepared, and the people say: What a wonderful President we have or what a wonderful governor we have and what a terrible Congress or terrible legislature we have. That is all due to the manner in which these things are carried on. The public can come into our galleries. The press is in our galleries. They report everything that goes on on the floor of the House and the public sees everything. Now and then, in the friction of debate, outrageous things may be said, and, of course, the high lights are carried throughout the country. The careful work that is done in the committees is seldom apparent, so that the representative body suffers generally because of these high lights. Of course, we can not blame the press, for it is news.

On the other hand, you never see a Capitol guide go over to the White House and you never see a guide in a State capitol go into the governor's office and say, "My friends, here is a President at work" or "Here is a governor at work." So the executive branch of our Government does not have the high lights sent all over the country by the press, and much that goes on in the executive branch of the Government is kept from the public eyes. That is one thing we can not help; but it is a point of attack and it is being used, as I say, by those who advocate executive control of the Government of the United States, and there is no small movement on foot for some kind of a dictatorship in this country.

Now, as to the "lame-duck" situation, we can not cure the other situation, but we can cure the presence here of hold-over Congressmen after they have been repudiated by the people of their own districts. It is a thing we can do and that we ought to do. In view of the convulsions going on all over the world—the civic convulsions, the upsetting of governments, the establishment of new rules and new doctrines of government, and the advocacy of new theories, some of them with a fairly intellectual support—I think it is well for us at every place we can to cure anything that may give rise to criticism, and I know of nothing that gives rise to more criticism than the "lame-duck" situation. Therefore, I hope this resolution will prevail. [Applause.]

Mr. GIFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I yield such time, up to 15 minutes, as the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. NOLAN] may care to use.

Mr. NOLAN. Mr. Chairman, I do not know that any discussion of this question at this time is anything but a waste of time. I think the attendance here this afternoon indicates that so far as the membership of this House is concerned everyone has made up his mind how he is going to vote upon this question when it comes up for final action. It has been before the Congress for a number of years. It has been discussed in the public press and by those who are interested in our Government.

It is a change in the Constitution that does not in any way affect any of the fundamental rights contained in that document. It does not in any way change the structure of our Government. It is merely a mechanical change or a change in our procedure. It makes our representative Government more representative and more directly responsive to the will of the people as expressed in an election.

When the Constitution was adopted we were living in a period of the stage coach, poor roads, no adequate means of communication. Conditions have changed now. We are living in a period of highways, electricity, steam, telegraph, telephone, and other means of communication, and all that this amendment of the Constitution will do will be to bring the Constitution itself up to date, so that it will conform with the times in which we live and make our Government more in harmony with the theory and practices of responsible, representative government. [Applause.]

Mr. GIFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself three minutes on the matter of the Longworth amendment as it may possibly be amended.

I am one of those who fear, unless the Longworth amendment is adopted in this House, we will be unable to get a two-thirds vote in favor of the resolution; but, in the event the Longworth amendment is defeated, I am extremely anxious that we understand the other amendment that will be offered.

The limitation of May 4 in the second session of Congress would remain in that amendment, with the words added "unless the Congress shall by law appoint different dates." This removes any question of the President's failing to call a special session if needed, but both branches of Congress by joint action could call the extra session. If, a few days before the session was to be concluded, it was found that the business could not be properly transacted, the Congress itself could vote a different date for adjournment, but it would be by joint action. I want to impress upon the Members the fact we are not yielding our rights to the Executive, and all the argument I have heard up to this time has been based upon the fact that the President might fail to call us in special session if needed. We can continue ourselves in session; but, I repeat again, it must be by joint action of both branches, and I am very anxious and very desirous that the Members who have been opposing the Longworth amendment should give consideration to this amendment, if and when proposed.

This is the purpose for which I yielded myself the three minutes, Mr. Chairman, and I trust now that we may be able to agree upon a time for adjournment for the day.

Mr. JEFFERS. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. BULWINKLE, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee, having had under consideration the Senate Joint Resolution 14, had directed him to report that it had come to no resolution thereon.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE

To Mr. NIEDRINGHAUS (at the request of Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri), for 10 days, on account of important business.

LEAVE TO EXTEND REMARKS

Mr. MICHENER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members who have spoken to-day may have the privilege of revising and extending their remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan?

There was no objection.

LABOR'S INTEREST IN UNITED STATES OIL INDUSTRY

Mr. AYRES. I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD and incorporate therein a statement by Harvey C. Fremming, international president of the Oil Field, Gas Well, and Refining Workers of America.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. AYRES. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include a summary of a statement made before the House Ways and Means Committee Thursday, February 4, on the proposed excise tax on foreign petroleum products by Harvey C. Fremming, international president of the Oil Field Gas Well and Refining Workers of America, this statement being joined in by Edward J. McGrady, legislative representative, American Federation of Labor; M. J. Flynn, America's Wage Earners' Protective Conference; D. C. Cone, Brotherhood of Signalmen; A. S. Stout, Brotherhood of Maintenance of Way; A. J. Lovell, Brotherhood of Firemen and Enginemen; George Laughlin, Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers; W. D. Johnson, Order of Railroad Conductors; J. A. Farquharson, Brotherhood of Railroad Trainmen, this group representing directly affiliated members in a number exceeding five and one-half million, practically all of whom are citizens and voters.

The statement is as follows:

The workers in the oil industry, joined by workers in allied industries not directly connected with the production, transportation, and refining of petroleum, are requesting from Congress the same protection which in the past has been accorded to other industries and their workers. We are asking that American markets be reserved for American products in order that American labor may maintain American standards of living, that we may have for our jobs that degree of security to which we believe we are entitled.

American patriotism is silenced in many of the oil-producing communities, where workers are listening with active interest to the doctrines of Bolshevism and communism, while clever and unscrupulous agitators emphasize to them the iniquities of an economic system which dooms to starvation armies of American workers while a few great oil-importing concerns or their subsidiaries are paying hundreds of millions of dollars yearly in dividends, whose rates sometimes reach as high as 400 per cent per year. These men are faced by a condition which no arguments can minimize. They know that their communities would be prosperous, that they would be earning American wages, maintaining their families under normal American standards, if the industry in which they labor was not utterly demoralized by the imported products of cheap labor to the fabulous enrichment of a few wealthy corporations.

The proper protection of the American petroleum industry is the only means by which we can correct the evils of the present situation and cure that growing spirit of unrest which is now seriously questioning the justice of our whole economic and political system. Only through such a measure can we restore to employment the hundreds of thousands of oil workers now idle and a like employment for hosts of other workers producing material and other products either used by the petroleum industry or consumed by its employees.

The four points made by the spokesman for the oil-importing firms at the hearing on the excise bill carry their own refutation. While these are palpably misstatements of fact, it might not be amiss to constructively set forth the actual facts, which are at total variance with the fabulous statements presented by this apologist for the present disastrous situation.

The first of these gross misstatements is that unemployment in the oil industry amounts to only about 35,000 workers. The official data compiled by the Bureau of Labor Statistics in the United States Department of Labor shows an average decrease to 65.7 among oil workers for 1931, compared to the base year of 1926, while for December, 1931, employment of those engaged in the production of crude petroleum was 58.2, if 1926 is assumed to be 100, while pay-roll totals decreased to 54.9 on the 1926 base of 100. This means nearly a 50 per cent cut in employment and in wages and shows the unemployment in the oil industry to be 350,000 men, in round numbers.

The second misleading statement of the spokesman of the oil-importing firms, who are the only ones profiting from the present demoralizing conditions, is that the employment in Venezuela is mainly American and at American wages.

It is utterly false to state that the employment in the Venezuelan petroleum industry is largely American, since there is only one American for each 100 natives employed, and it is equally false to claim that American wages are generally paid, when those wages sometimes are only less than one-tenth of the amount paid in the United States to American labor for doing similar work. Those living standards which have been won by American labor only after long years of struggle can not be maintained if we are forced to enter our home markets in competition with the foreign labor earning such a small fraction of the wages paid in this country.

The third point attempted by the representative of the great oil importers is that there is no available fuel oil equal to foreign fuel oil in quality as well as volume. Twenty-one tankers are now tied up on the Pacific coast with a total dead-weight tonnage of 195,000 tons. If these tankers could be put in operation, as would be necessary to comply with the law requiring that American products be carried in American bottoms in coastwise and intercoastal traffic, employment would be given to many seamen now in distress, needed employment would be afforded to our merchant marine, and it would have the effect of increasing the amount of tolls received by the Panama Canal, while there would not be sufficient increase in cost laid down at Atlantic ports to seriously affect the use of this commodity by those who might prefer it to coal.

The tremendous quantity of fuel oil already available—99,000,000 barrels—waiting in storage in California alone evidences the absurdity of any claim that we could not supply the American market for this commodity. When to the amounts available in California one adds the large quantities now in storage in other oil States, it can be seen that the provision of an American market for American fuel oil would be of tremendous importance in relieving the present pressure of cost in carrying these quantities of oil in storage.

The statement that American producers operating in foreign lands have prior rights to American markets is vigorously challenged. The logical conclusion of such an argument would mean the immediate abandonment of the development of our own natural resources in any case where American capital had discovered, purchased, or obtained control of similar resources in foreign lands.

Labor has an especial interest in such suggestions. It need surprise no one that labor is wondering whether the same theory will not be carried into the immigration field as well as into other fields.

One logical conclusion of this theory that American producers operating abroad have prior rights to American markets would carry the suggestion that it is as proper for American capitalists to import foreign labor as to import the products of foreign labor and place them in competition with the products of American workers. From the standpoint of labor, there is no difference whatever between American labor being brought into competition with cheap foreign labor in this country or with the products produced by the same, or an even lower class of cheap labor in some foreign countries, such as Russia or Venezuela. When we recall that in December, 1931, a great tanker laden with Soviet gasoline entered an American port and declared the production cost of that gasoline was 1.94 cents per gallon, we may understand why American labor has a very keen and fundamental interest in the passage by Congress of legislation which will protect American workers from such hopeless competition. The only alternative to such legislation is an abject surrender either to the foreign product or else the debasement of the American living standards, of which we have long boasted.

For the sake of hundreds of thousands of American workers, organized and unorganized, in behalf of American industry, paralyzed through the vanishing purchasing power of these workers, in behalf of the railroad workers of the Nation whose present plight is due to the drop in freight movements because of the wreckage of a basic industry of the Nation, and in the name of American justice and fair play, equal rights, and open opportunity, the American petroleum industry should be restored, even at the cost of decreasing the swollen dividends of a few great oil-importing corporations.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. ARENTZ. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD a brief statement made by Lester Balliet, director-chairman of the governor's emergency committee on employment, Tonopah, Nev.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 13, 1932

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

We beseech Thee, our Father, that Thou wilt quicken all who walk in the way of duty and those who may search out neglected duty, and may they take upon themselves the whole service of our country. We thank Thee that Thou dost overflow with tenderness and grace, and that they come to us who are full of faults and weaknesses; we praise Thee that Thou art our remedy and our hope. O God, may our country build that new heaven and that earth in which dwelleth righteousness and happiness; then men shall be able to stand the wear and the tear of the exigencies of time and change. Do Thou minister to the social influence of the family by affection, by refined taste, and by that peace and joy which have their pattern in Thee. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

FRED R. MILLER

Mr. WARREN. Mr. Speaker, I offer a privileged resolution from the Committee on Accounts and ask for its immediate consideration.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina offers a privileged resolution, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

House Resolution 89

Resolved, That there be paid out of the contingent fund of the House $600 to Fred R. Miller for extra and expert services as expert legal examiner to the Committee on Pensions from March 4, 1931, to March 4, 1932, second session of Seventy-first Congress and first session of Seventy-second Congress.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. Speaker, this resolution and the one which I intend to offer immediately following are the regular resolutions passed in reference to the special examiners assigned to the Committees on Pensions and Invalid Pensions. I am instructed by the Committee on Accounts to inform the House that it will not be the future policy of the committee to approve these two resolutions.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WARREN. I yield.

Mr. STAFFORD. I notice we are virtually giving back pay to the gentleman, because the resolution provides for payment from March 1, 1931, to March 1, 1932. What is the reason for the belated introduction of this back-pay resolution, even though the amount is small?

Mr. WARREN. It is for the past year. This resolution is for services rendered up until March 4 of this year.

Mr. STAFFORD. We will cease this practice after this resolution is adopted?

Mr. WARREN. That is the unanimous opinion of the committee.

Mr. STAFFORD. And the gentleman believes this $600 is a small amount for terminating this service?

Mr. WARREN. That is correct.

The resolution was agreed to.

AMY C. DUNNE

Mr. WARREN. Mr. Speaker, I offer a privileged resolution and ask its immediate consideration.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina offers a resolution, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

House Resolution 96

Resolved, That there be paid out of the contingent fund of the House of Representatives $465 to Amy C. Dunne for extra and expert services rendered the Committee on Invalid Pensions from March 11, 1931, to December 19, 1931, as assistant clerk to such committee by detail from the Veterans' Administration.

The resolution was agreed to.

JAMES W. BOYER, JR.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. Speaker, I offer a further resolution and ask for its immediate consideration.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina offers a further resolution, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

House Resolution 118

Resolved, That there be paid out of the contingent fund of the House $600 to James W. Boyer, jr., for extra and expert services as expert legal examiner to the Committee on World War Veterans' Legislation.

Mr. STAFFORD. If the gentleman will yield, will the gentleman explain to the House whether this is the customary resolution for these services? I do not recall that the House has heretofore ever paid extra services to any clerk of the Veterans' Bureau. I do recall having paid for extra services to clerks connected with the Committee on Pensions and the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Mr. WARREN. This is a customary resolution that has been passed in this case for the last two years. There are only three. These are the three I have just presented.

The resolution was agreed to.

EXPENSES INCURRED BY COMMITTEE ON COINAGE, WEIGHTS, AND MEASURES

Mr. WARREN. Mr. Speaker, I offer a further resolution and ask for its immediate consideration.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina offers a further resolution, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

House Resolution 136

Resolved, That the expenses of conducting the investigation authorized by House Resolution 72, incurred by the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures, acting as a whole or by subcommittee, shall be paid out of the contingent fund of the House on vouchers authorized by the committee, signed by the chairman thereof and approved by the Committee on Accounts, but shall not exceed $5,000.

The resolution was agreed to.

IMPEACHMENT CHARGES—REPORT FROM COMMITTEE ON THE JUDICIARY

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I offer a report from the Committee on the Judiciary, and I would like to give notice that immediately upon the reading of the report I shall move the previous question.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas offers a report, which the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read the report, as follows:

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES—RELATIVE TO THE ACTION OF THE COMMITTEE ON THE JUDICIARY WITH REFERENCE TO HOUSE RESOLUTION 92

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas, from the Committee on the Judiciary, submitted the following report (to accompany H. Res. 143):

I am directed by the Committee on the Judiciary to submit to the House, as its report to the House, the following resolution adopted by the Committee on the Judiciary indicating its action with reference to House Resolution No. 92 heretofore referred by the House to the Committee on the Judiciary:

Whereas Hon. WRIGHT PATMAN, Member of the House of Representatives, filed certain impeachment charges against Hon. Andrew W. Mellon, Secretary of the Treasury, which were referred to this committee; and

Whereas pending the investigation of said charges by said committee, and before said investigation had been completed, the said Hon. Andrew W. Mellon was nominated by the President of the United States for the post of ambassador to the Court of St. James and the said nomination was duly confirmed by the United States Senate pursuant to law, and the said Andrew W. Mellon has resigned the position of Secretary of the Treasury: Be it Resolved by this committee, That the further consideration of the said charges made against the said Andrew W. Mellon, as Secretary of the Treasury, be, and the same are hereby, discontinued.

MINORITY VIEWS

We can not join in the majority views and findings. While we concur in the conclusions of the majority that section 243 of the Revised Statutes, upon which the proceedings herein were based, provides for action in the nature of an ouster proceeding, it is our view that the Hon. Andrew W. Mellon, the former Secretary of the Treasury, having removed himself from that office, no useful purpose would be served by continuing the investigation of the charges filed by the Hon. WRIGHT PATMAN. We desire to stress that the action of the undersigned is based on that reason alone, particularly when the prohibition contained in said section 243 is not applicable to the office now held by Mr. Mellon.

FIORELLO H. LAGUARDIA.
GORDON BROWNING.
M. C. TARVER.
FRANCIS B. CONDON.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I think the resolution is fairly explanatory of the views held by the different members of the committee. No useful purpose could be served by the consumption of the usual 40 minutes, so I move the previous question.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

PRINTING OF HEARINGS

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I desire to ascertain if under the implied intent of the rules of this House, before a bill may be properly considered by the House, the hearings pertaining to the particular bill under consideration should be available to the membership. What I have in mind, Mr. Speaker, is this: That at the time the House considered the bill relating to the Reconstruction Finance Corporation all of the hearings were not printed. In a very few days, as I understand—as we are informed by the press—we will be called upon to consider another bill on the question of the Federal reserve and the issuance of additional currency. Hearings are now being held, and I desire to be informed if it is not possible for the membership to have those hearings before we are called upon to consider the bill.

The SPEAKER. As the gentleman is aware, the rules of the House do not require the printing of hearings before committees. The gentleman will have to address his inquiry to the chairman of the committee having the bill under consideration.

Mr. BRAND of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, the hearings were finished yesterday and I am satisfied that any Member can see the testimony to-day or on Monday morning.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. That will be very satisfactory, and I thank the gentleman for the information.

COMMENCEMENT OF TERMS OF PRESIDENT, VICE PRESIDENT, MEMBERS OF CONGRESS, ETC.

Mr. JEFFERS. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 14) proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States fixing the commencement of the terms of President and Vice President and Members of Congress and fixing the time of the assembling of Congress.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 14), with Mr. BULWINKLE in the chair.

The Clerk read the title of the joint resolution.

Mr. JEFFERS. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself one minute. Let me call the attention of the Members to the fact that during the afternoon we will have up for consideration in connection with this proposed constitutional amendment several amendments, and I hope the membership will remain here so that we will not be caused to lose valuable time if some one should make the point of no quorum. I trust the Members will remain in the Chamber. We are going to get through with the consideration of this resolution this afternoon under the 5-minute rule after we conclude the general debate.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FIESINGER].

Mr. FIESINGER. Mr. Chairman, I am a member of the committee that has had this resolution under consideration. I concur in the action of the committee and I rise to state that I am favorable to the resolution. I believe it is a step in the way of progress and I believe further that it has the command of the American people, and I know of the people of my district.

It has been indicated and asserted in the debates and by mention of individual Members that a number of amendments will be offered. While not in any way impugning the motives of the proponents of such amendments and believing that such amendments will be offered with a sincere desire to be helpful, yet I shall be constrained to vote against all such amendments because of the fear I entertain that the amendments will tend to impede the final adoption of the resolution which I interpret to have the righteous command of the American people.

Any amendment offered to extend the terms of Members of the House of Representatives I shall especially oppose, because in my humble judgment its tendency would be to centralize power and tend to lessen the rights of the people in popular government.

I desire to take no further time and I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. JEFFERS. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. LEWIS]. [Applause.]

Mr. LEWIS. Gentlemen of the committee, you are about to propose a most desirable change in our institutions, a change which the passage of time has indicated to be necessary for the efficient operation of the great function of national legislation.

I am about to bring to your attention an ingredient in that institution where another change is equally shown to be necessary and important in the operation of the legislative part of our Government.

When this House of Commons was established, ladies and gentlemen, there were few parliaments in the world from whose rituals we could draw.

The ancient democracies gave us virtually no faith-inspiring instruction as to a proper length of term for Members of the representative body.

May I say that research discloses that in only two countries of the world, in Colombia and in Mexico, is the term of the member of their lower house as long as two years. In 18 of the leading 25 countries of the world the term is four years or more, and in the following countries, the first naturally to come in our minds when we consider matters by way of comparison, we have Canada with a 5-year term, France with a 4-year term, Germany 4 years, Italy 5 years, Japan 4 years, Sweden 4 years, Switzerland 4 years, and in England a term of 5 years.

Looking into the effect of the "vote of confidence" on the prematuring of the term, I found that in England, taking all the votes of want of confidence into account, during the Victorian age the term in the House of Commons lasted, on the average, some 3 years and 10 months.

Gentlemen of the House, we are definitely Representatives of the people who live within our districts. How many do we represent? On the average, 285,000. Remember that we are the principal human avenues of approach of these 285,000 to our great Government, with its present multiplied and magnified relations to human life. Two hundred and eighty-five thousand to serve. In Canada it is 41,000, in France 67,000, in Germany 108,000, in Italy 107,000, in Sweden 27,000, in Switzerland 22,000, and in England 72,000.

On top of our shortened term and of this greatly magnified number of people we are called upon to represent we have another onerous circumstance. It is the double election that characterizes the politics of our country. It was 13 months before we were allowed to assemble here on this occasion. Already primary troubles had begun to show themselves—yea, and to assert their depleting claims in the hearts of many of the Members of this body.

We are human beings. We are, naturally, going to think of our own futures as well as the well-being of our country. I want to say to you that, judged not only by my individual experience but judged by those comparisons which I have only too briefly given you of the experience of other countries, the 2-year term in the United States does not stand justified by present needs or present human circumstances.

It is a matter of tradition that the makers of the Constitution greatly feared oligarchy and absolutism in their day and that the 2-year term was determined upon so that quick, opposing, and antagonistic responses would come from the people if those higher in the Government should attempt such reactionary conduct. Happily, such fears have been completely dissipated by experience. Not only is there no sign of such absolutism but, thinking of the stability of our institutions, if there be anything unstable on this planet after a century and a half of experience with the ideals of our fathers, thank God we are able to say that it is monarchical institutions, aristocratic institutions, that stand in peril and not those other democratic institutions planted on the wider base of the whole population of the country. [Applause.]

Mr. BURTNESS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LEWIS. I do, gladly.

Mr. BURTNESS. I was interested in the figures with reference to the number of people represented by individual members in other parliaments. The gentleman has served here before. Has the gentleman any observation to make with reference to the additional amount of work done by Members now as compared with a few years ago?

Mr. LEWIS. The gentleman's question is most timely and appropriate. It happens that after some six years of service in this body my services ceased here and other public work took its place. Coming back now, after some 14 years, the break in my legislative experiences has compelled comparisons. I certainly am not overstating the comparison when I say that the number of problems now presented are four times as great as they were 20 years ago and that they have lost nothing in complexity in the intervening time. [Applause.]

Mr. GIFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. TILSON].

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Chairman, it had not been my purpose to speak at any length on this resolution. On two occasions when it was discussed here—March, 1928, and February, 1931—I took my full share of time and participated quite freely in the debate. I am not doing it to-day, because, first, lack of time, and second, because I feel that the remarks heretofore made by me express my views quite as accurately and completely as I could now express them. These views are pretty well understood by the older Members and the younger Members will be able to gather all the information and inspiration on this subject that they may need if they listen to the remarks of the others.

I do not regard this as the most important piece of legislation in the world. To this extent I agree with the gentleman from New York [Mr. O'CONNOR], that there are many more important things that this Congress should do. The fact is that for more than 140 years we have gone along on the original provision of the Constitution on this subject.

Compared with other countries of the world, we surely have not suffered by having followed the provision in connection with the meeting time of Congress. Until quite recently there was no effort on the part of anyone to change this provision of the Constitution, but it has been so long since any legislation has been enacted under the provision which permits Congress to meet at any time that there has gone out over the country the notion that Congress can not meet until 13 months after election, and that the retiring Member continues to serve until December. Of course, anyone who reads the Constitution understandingly knows better. The term of a retiring Member expires on the 3d of March. The new Member begins on March 4 to act as a Member in all nonsession duties. He is sworn in either at the regular session in December, or sooner, at a special session called by the President, if the public interests demand it.

In earlier days, on a number of occasions, Congress did act under the constitutional provision relating to meetings of Congress, and fixed the date when Congress should assemble. The most memorable example of the action of Congress in this respect was in the early days of the administration of Andrew Johnson, when there was such a bitter state of partisanship existing that Congress professed to believe that the Government was not safe in the hands of President Johnson unless Congress were in session. Therefore Congress did act and fixed the date of the meeting of subsequent Congresses on the 4th day of March of the odd years. For three successive Congresses, Congress did meet on that date and continued in potential session all through the 2-year term.

In all fairness, I should add that some of the worst legislation ever enacted in the history of our country was enacted during that period, from some of which the Nation is still suffering 60 years afterward.

After the passions of the Civil War had somewhat subsided Congress very sensibly concluded that there was no necessity for so early assembling after the election and repealed the law. Congress then rejected what will surely prove to be the result if this amendment is ratified—a continuous session during the two years or life of the Congress. Therefore in the early seventies this statute was repealed and Congress went back to the time fixed by the Constitution in case Congress fails to set a different date. From that time to the present day Congress has never seen fit to fix a different date from that thus provided for in the Constitution, but the President on many occasions has seen fit, when the public interests seemed to demand it, to convene Congress in a special session—not 13 months after election but immediately after the 4th day of March.

The President can now call a special session at any time if he deems the public interests demand it, while any Congress has the power to bind its successor to the extent of compelling the new Congress to meet at any time after March 3.

When, if ever, has the country suffered by reason of Congress not being in session? I do not recall the occasion and history is silent on the subject. Then why change the Constitution for such a purpose? In my remarks on this floor when a similar resolution was being discussed in the Seventieth Congress, I said:

> While fixing the date on which Congress shall meet is not of vital importance, changing the Constitution for this or any other purpose is a serious matter. Of the amendments adopted since the first 10—which were to all intents and purposes a part of the original Constitution—some were unnecessary, some have not worked as expected, some have worked badly, and some have not worked at all.
> Doubtless I am somewhat old-fashioned in this respect, but I have a deep, sincere affection and admiration for that old document, and I hate to see it changed without the best of reasons. Our experience in changing this precious instrument has not been such as to encourage further experiment along this line, except for reasons clear and compelling. I do not believe that the reasons given for the proposed change are sufficient or convincing, but, on the contrary, that when analyzed they become untenable.
> What are the alleged reasons for adding the proposed amendment to the Constitution? The one argument upon which the demand for a change in the meeting date of Congress is based is that the time is too long between the election and the meeting of the new Congress. Looked at superficially, this is a plausible argument, especially when made to appear that 13 months must elapse after the election before the newly elected Member actually takes his seat; but even this formidable charge can be met and readily answered. In the first place, this charge is not true as I have stated it and as it is usually stated. Under our present Constitution only four months must elapse before the new Member may take his seat. Any longer time than four months is only because Congress, in its wisdom, has not seen fit to fix March 4 as the date for the new Congress to meet. Then we are called upon to pass a constitutional amendment in order to have Congress meet 60 days earlier than it could otherwise. And even then, in the case of a new President, he will not come in for 20 days longer, so that in reality the new Congress will gain only 40 days by meeting January 4 instead of March 4.
> But we are told in all seriousness that it will never do for the new Congress to meet as late as March 4, which can be done by a simple resolution, because that would mean running into midsummer, and it is hot in Washington during June and July. Shades of our illustrious predecessors! Shall we amend the Constitution of our country in order to avoid a few days of personal discomfort? [Applause.]

In connection with the present resolution the same reasons and excuses have been advanced as in previous discussions, but little that will stand up under analysis. Of course, the practice of other countries has been dwelt upon always without referring to the totally different conditions existing in those countries, especially as to the form of government. In my remarks during the debate on the subject I said:

> The practice in foreign countries of early assembling is cited, but there is no real similarity, and any argument based on such an analogy is not well grounded but is altogether misleading. In other countries governments fall and cease to function, carrying in their fall both executive and legislative authority, which are not separated, so that a new government must be formed to carry on. There is no such thing in our system of government. Our executive and legislative powers are distinct and our terms of office are fixed by law or the Constitution. And, on the whole, has not the plan worked reasonably well, even as compared with foreign countries?

Later, after much had been said about foreign parliaments, I referred to the matter again:

> The practice of foreign countries in early assembling is cited and made much of, but this is readily disposed of when it is remembered that in this respect our Government, where the legislative and executive powers are separated, is entirely different from any of those countries where the legislative and executive powers are combined so that when one ministry falls and fails to function another must promptly take its place. Who can say that this difference has not added to rather than detracted from the success achieved by our Government? The practice of foreign countries has no analogy to our own, so that arguments based upon it are without substantial foundation.

There are real, substantial, practical reasons in the case of our Government why it is better, except in cases of emergency or when some very important extraordinary legislation like a tariff bill is to be passed, that there should be a long interval between the elections and the convening of the new Congress. I can do no better than quote from previous remarks made by me on a similar occasion:

> Let us consider for a moment whether any real harm comes from postponing the date of convening the new Congress even the full limit of 13 months. We are now under a Budget system and it is working well. During the summer and autumn the President, through the heads of executive departments and the Director of the Budget, prepares the estimates of the several departments and makes up the Budget. It is sent to Congress the first week in December. As at present, the old Congress is organized and before January 4 is well under way in the consideration of the supply bills. The Cabinet heads, who under the outgoing President have submitted their estimates, now come before the committees of Congress and explain each the portion of the Budget which relates to his department. Before March 4, if Congress attends to business, all the supply bills and other necessary legislation is passed, and the old Congress and the old President, with his Cabinet heads and their assistants, all go out together. The new President comes in on March 4 with a new Cabinet and assistants and begins at once to prepare for the new estimates and the new Budget to be submitted in the autumn.
> Meanwhile, the new Congress on and after March 4 stands ready to meet in case of need to pass emergency or any other legislation deemed necessary for the public interest. Time after time the new Congress has been called together early for one reason or another, and there is no danger that the public interest will ever suffer for want of a Congress ready to serve.
>
> Let us see what would be the situation under the proposed amendment. The old President and his Cabinet must make up the Budget, as before, but can not submit it before January 4. It is then submitted to a new Congress, not thoroughly organized and without committees. Meanwhile the "lame-duck" President holds on for 20 days. Whether he delivers a message on the state of the Union to the new assemblage, now cleansed of its "lame-duck" contamination, is not specified in the resolution.
> Having organized—if no deadlock interferes—and counted the electoral vote, if there is time, the now pure congressional aggregation, out of deference to the new President soon to come in, will probably twiddle their thumbs until January 24 arrives. And now work must begin—on the supply bills, at any rate. A new Cabinet will have taken the place of the old and without time to learn anything whatever about their several departments, with no knowledge whatever of the estimates or the Budget, they must appear before the committees of Congress to explain and defend the provisions of their several bills. The new President must take on faith the Budget of his "lame-duck" predecessor, for surely he is not in position to make up one of his own; and so throughout the first year of his term, the most important year of all for him, the benefits of the Budget system may be nullified, so far as he is concerned. Can you imagine anything worse than such a situation? And yet I have not in the least overdrawn what must inevitably happen in case this amendment should be ratified.

If the "lame-duck" session is a bad thing we can abolish it by a joint resolution and meet on the 4th day of March, after the elections, and in the even years at any time Congress may see fit to fix. It is not necessary to pass this resolution in order to eliminate the "lame-duck" session. I said so emphatically in the debate to which I have referred in the following language:

But it is not necessary to amend the Constitution in order to have an early meeting of the new Congress; and if it be believed that this is what is needed and what the people are demanding, let it be done by an act of Congress. As it stands to-day, Congress can fix any date of meeting it may deem best; and if it should turn out that the day fixed is not the best date, it can be changed and go back to the old date that has served satisfactorily throughout our history. But once fix the date by the Constitution, and it must stand whether satisfactory or not, whether it work well or ill.

As to the harm that might come from "lame-duck" Members, participating in legislation, it seems to me this has always been the most preposterous thing that ever could be offered to influence rational men. The idea that because a man is defeated for Congress he is thereby discredited and disqualified from acting as a legislator is grotesquely absurd. As the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. MONTAGUE] said so forcefully and cleverly yesterday, the proposition is utterly ridiculous.

As he said, this is one time in the life of a Member of Congress when he can vote his real convictions without the hope of reward or the fear of punishment. I defy successful contradiction of the statement I am about to make: That some of the best legislation that has ever been passed by any Congress has been passed in the short session, and often when a considerable number of men have been defeated. The percentage of men not returning is small, many of these retiring voluntarily; in fact, so small as to have no influence whatever, even though we might concede the thing that is not true, that they have been discredited and that, having been discredited, they would betray the interests of their country. The idea is preposterous. [Applause.]

The part of the resolution providing for the election of President has been referred to as one of the important provisions of this amendment. One trouble with this is that we do not know where the new proposition might land us, because no one can foretell what will arise in the future. We have tried the old and have not suffered from it, but no one can tell how the provisions of this amendment will work in case of a controversy.

There is one thing I wish to call particular attention to, and that is the fact that Congress under the present provision is organized and ready for legislation. In the proposed amendment it is not. In 1876, when the unfortunate controversy between Hayes and Tilden occurred, when there was danger of civil strife or revolution in this country, the fact was that the House had been organized, the Speaker had been elected, Congress was actually in existence and was able to act.

Congress took action to meet the emergency. A commission was appointed. Whether we agree with the final decision of the commission has nothing to do with the case. The point is that Congress was in a position to act and did act and did appoint a commission to save the country from danger. The magnanimous action of the defeated candidate for President, Mr. Tilden, should always be gratefully remembered by all of the people of these United States. [Applause.] The fact I wish to emphasize is that at this time Congress was organized. The contests of the election had been settled, which can not be the case under the proposed change. More than that, when the choice of a President depends on the action of the new Congress, not organized, the difficulty of organizing may be greatly increased. Let us assume that the parties are fairly evenly divided in the House, so that the change of a vote or two might, in its result, make a difference in the presidency itself.

We can readily foresee that there might be very serious danger from having the old Congress out of existence, and the new Congress, without organization, to be depended upon to count the votes or to elect the President. Please observe, also, that by this resolution only 20 days are allowed in which Congress must organize and elect a President, if one has not been elected by the Electoral College. I called attention to this danger in previous remarks on the subject, as follows:

Can we afford to take such a step which, once taken, can not be retraced? It matters nothing to me personally. It matters little to any of us older Members, whose time here after this amendment is in effect at most will not be long; but it does matter very much to the people of the country through all the years to come and to those who follow us here in giving service to the country. I have one boy of my own, dearer to me than my own life, as every father will understand. He is only a schoolboy now, but in the dreams of a fond father touching his son I have seen him standing here in my place, giving himself to the service of his country as his father has faithfully tried to do. I would not for this right arm do anything by my vote that would make his path more difficult or render his service and that of the others who will then stand where we now stand, less effective or useful.

Among all the many able newspapermen gathered here in Washington none has described the so-called "lame duck" resolution we are now considering so concisely or so accurately as the brilliant columnist George Rothwell Brown when he characterized it as a quack remedy for a disease of the Constitution that it does not have. Nor can I close my own remarks now more fittingly than by quoting what I said in closing four years ago:

I can not vote for this resolution. Neither can I allow it to pass without giving voice to my opposition and utterance to my conviction that its adoption will be an unfortunate mistake which those responsible for it should never cease to regret. And remember, when we give our vote for it and send it on its way all the harm of which it is capable throughout the years to come will have been done, so far as we are concerned.

[Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Connecticut has expired.

Mr. KELLER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TILSON. My time has expired.

Mr. KELLER. I wanted to ask a question and the question is this——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Connecticut has expired.

Mr. GIFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. RAMSEYER].

Mr. RAMSEYER. Mr. Chairman, a resolution similar to this one was before the House in 1928 and again in 1931. Like the distinguished gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. TILSON] who preceded me, I have addressed myself at length to the membership of the House on each occasion when the proposition was before us. The gentleman from Connecticut and myself are on different sides of this proposition. I have a profound respect for the gentleman for his attitude and for his courage always in taking the side of any controversy that he thinks is right. I first became interested in this proposal when it was being studied by a special committee of the American Bar Association. It was before such special committee a number of years. This committee made a report to the American Bar Association in 1923. I was present at the particular session when this resolution was up for discussion. It was unanimously indorsed by the American Bar Association at the convention of that association in 1923. This committee prepared a resolution to be introduced in Congress. I took the proposed resolution and introduced it on the first day of the following session here, that is, the first Monday in December, 1923. Afterward, during that session, I appeared before the committee having charge of the joint resolution and argued in favor of it.

I do not attach as much importance to this resolution as some Members do. I am in entire sympathy with the gentleman from Connecticut in resenting the reflections cast by some upon Members who happen to be defeated—that their defeat means there is something wrong with them and that they can no longer be trusted. Some of the leading men of our country, including Lincoln, were defeated time and again. In fact, some of the noblest characters of history never could be elected to any office. They were guillotined, burned at the stake, and even crucified.

I have favored the resolution in the past and still favor it. I think newly elected Members should be allowed to go into action sooner than they do now under the present practice. If I were responsible for the program for this House, this resolution would not be here exactly at this time. I agree with what has been said—that there are more important matters before the country that should receive attention. The passing of this resolution will not feed the hungry nor furnish any jobs to the unemployed. It will not help to solve the economic paradox of impoverishment in the midst of abundance, to correct the inequitable distribution of wealth, or to solve the money and credit problem, which I consider at this time the most important problem before the American people.

The resolution before us I favor in the main. There have been suggestions made during the debates that we must not amend this resolution in any manner. I do not know why Members take the floor and speak that way. When this resolution passes the House it should reflect the independent judgment of this House. [Applause.] Thomas Jefferson, in his Manual, after stating the rule against referring to debates and votes in the other House, gives as his reason in support of the rule, the following:

> Because the opinion of each House should be left to its independency, not to be influenced by the proceedings of the other.

One of the amendments to be offered is the Longworth amendment. I did not vote for it when it was offered before and shall not vote for it to-day, for the reason that I think we should go on the assumption that Congress will have sense enough to adjourn when it is through with its business; but if I had believed in that amendment when it was considered before, if I still believed in it, I would vote for it to-day. I would express my own independent judgment. Just because the other body has not taken kindly to this proposal is no reason why Members should not at this time exercise their own independent judgment on that amendment or any other amendment that may be proposed. [Applause.]

There is no danger of this resolution proposing an amendment to the Constitution getting lost in the shuffle. It was lost at the end of the last session because there were only a few days of the session left when it was sent to conference. If there are some provisions in the resolution different from the Senate resolution—and there are already provisions in it that are materially different—it will go to conference. The conferees can come back for further instruction. The same with the Senate conferees.

The Longworth amendment, and also an amendment which I shall offer at the end of the resolution, have never been considered by the other body. No one here knows what the other body thinks about either one of them. Even though some of you may think you know how the other body feels about it, it is all the more reason why you should at this time express your own independent judgment on the amendments to be offered. Probably the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. LEWIS] will offer an amendment. Each House should be left to its own independency of judgment on these matters. There is no reason in the world why this House should have an inferiority complex every time the other body is mentioned, or when we find the views of the other body are different from this body. If we truckle to the other body, or if the other body truckles to us, it will simply result in the body being truckled to losing respect for the other body, and the body truckling will lose its own self-respect. Exercise your own independent judgment on any of the amendments that are going to be offered under the 5-minute rule.

In 1928 when this joint resolution was before this body we printed as a House document the debate and proceedings. I have regarded this document as the best debate on any subject ever had in either House since I have been a Member of this House. I have made a somewhat careful study of each amendment to the Constitution beginning with the thirteenth amendment, and the procedure in the States in ratifying those amendments. Mr. Garrett, of Tennessee, formerly leader of the Democratic side, was probably as careful and as thorough a student of the Constitution as we have had in this body during recent years. When this proposal was before the House in 1928 Mr. Garrett offered an amendment to the resolution, which was adopted by a vote of 187 to 23, on a rising vote. That amendment was incorporated in the resolution which was before this House during the last session as section 6. For reasons or for no reason, the committee this time eliminated section 6. This section I regard as most important to insure orderly consideration of proposed amendments. My time is up. I will have more to say on my amendment under the 5-minute rule. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. JEFFERS. Mr. Chairman, I yield such time as he may desire to the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. HASTINGS].

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. Chairman, we have under consideration the joint resolution proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States fixing the commencement of the terms of President and Vice President and Members of Congress and fixing the time of the assembling of Congress.

A similar resolution has been before Congress for a number of years. It passed the House during the last session of Congress with an amendment fixing the date of the adjournment of the second session of each Congress.

This resolution contains five sections.

Section 1 fixes the time when the terms of President and Vice President shall end at noon on the 24th day of January, and the terms of Senators and Representatives at noon on the 4th day of January of the years in which such terms would have ended if this article had not been ratified. At the present time, of course, the terms begin and end on the 4th day of March.

Section 2 provides for the assembling of Congress at least once in every year and fixes the date of the meeting to begin at noon on the 4th day of January, unless Congress shall by law appoint a different day.

Section 3 provides for the election of a President and Vice President if death should occur to either or if the President elect or the Vice President elect fails to qualify. This section authorizes Congress to provide for this situation.

Power is given to Congress to provide by law who shall act as President in this case or the manner of selecting who shall act as President, but such person shall act only until a President is qualified or a Vice President is qualified.

Section 4 provides that Congress may provide for the contingency of death of any of the persons from whom the House of Representatives may choose a President or the Senate may choose a Vice President.

The report of the Committee on Election of President, Vice President, and Representatives in Congress is an exhaustive one and goes thoroughly into the reasons why favorable action should be had upon this amendment. It has been called to the attention of the public for a number of years.

I think everyone agrees that it is advisable to have sessions of Congress convene soon after the election.

When the original Constitution was adopted and our Government was organized in 1789 we had no modern facilities for communication or transportation and it was then necessary to have more time intervene between an election and the convening of Congress. This was particularly true when some of the Western States were admitted into the Union. Now all sections of the country have been brought together by modern means of communication and transportation, so that the necessity no longer exists for having such a long time intervene between the election and the date when Congress convenes and the Members elect assume office.

I voted for a similar resolution before and favor the passage of this resolution now.

Section 5 provides for this resolution to take effect on the 30th day of November of the year following the year in which this article is ratified.

This resolution must pass both branches of Congress by a two-thirds vote and be ratified by three-fourths of the States before it becomes operative, and not then until the 30th day of November of the year following the year in which this amendment is ratified and promulgated.

I have heard no convincing argument advanced why this resolution should not be passed proposing this amendment. There is always a reluctance to amend the Constitution. The framers of our Constitution provided a method of amendment. Without a general agreement to add the first 10 amendments the Constitution would not have been ratified. We could not have financed the World War without the income-tax amendment.

In brief, it will do three things:

First. It will provide for an early convening of the new Congress after each election;

Second. It will clarify the law with reference to filling the office of President in event of death or other failure to assume the duties of office before inauguration; and Third. It will provide a speedy recall in the event the Members of Congress do not reflect the true sentiment of the people of their districts.

Mr. JEFFERS. Mr. Chairman, I yield the balance of my time to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SUMNERS].

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, whenever we come to the responsibility of amending the Constitution of the United States we approach the most solemn responsibility, perhaps, which can be placed upon a Member of the American Congress.

During my period of service here one thing particularly has impressed itself upon me. In every field of human endeavor, except in the operation of government, men recognize that there are basic fundamental natural laws which limit human beings. That is true in every field of human endeavor except in the operation of government. Is not that an interesting fact? A person who would be a physician goes to school to learn the laws of nature which govern the human body. He succeeds in his practice in proportion as he is able to harmonize his practice with them. The scientist seeks to learn the laws of nature which govern in the field of endeavor. We have agricultural schools to teach boys how to work in accord with the laws of nature; but when we come to the point of undertaking to operate the complex machinery of a great Government we do not take cognizance of the fact that there are natural laws which limit our discretion. That is an interesting fact.

Now, I make this further observation, and I make it with all respect, that when you come to the scientific operation of government, in my humble opinion—and I put myself in the same class—we are about in the same relative development that medical science was when it bled George Washington to death over a hundred years ago. We do not even recognize that there are natural laws which govern in the realm in which you and I work.

That is preliminary to just one general statement I am going to try to get across. The Fourth of July orators tell us about the fact that the fathers met in some constitutional conventions and arranged our system of government with three coordinate branches. The truth of it is, of course, that the people who sat in the Constitutional Conventions did not have a single thing to do with reference to the arrangement of our system of Government in three coordinate branches. That arrangement of Government had been developing under natural law through a process of centuries among a people peculiarly gifted with the genius of self-government. It was not a debatable question when the constitutional conventions met. The men who assembled in those conventions were the agents of exactly that sort of government.

That brings me to the practical point to which I direct your attention, and that is the necessity of preserving, as far as we can, those lines of cleavage, not because those lines of cleavage originated from human genius but because they originated from the genius of God Almighty, who made the natural laws which govern governments.

Human experience has demonstrated beyond any peradventure of doubt that when you come to determine policy of government you need the counsel of many minds. No one man who sat in the Constitutional Convention would have done otherwise than shipwreck the whole system if he alone had been privileged to write the policy that was incorporated in the Constitution. When you come to execution you need a single Executive.

There is a tendency in this country, manifested when we come to write a tariff bill—and I do not want to get into the realm of partisan politics—and in the agencies of government that are expending these billions of dollars—in fact everywhere the tendency of the representative branch of the Government—to surrender the powers which nature says belong to the representative branch.

They are being surrendered to the Executive. That is the truth of it, and we are accumulating about the President of the United States powers so great that no human being in human history has been able and no human being ever will be able to possess without their abusive exercise. I mean, God Almighty has put that limitation upon human capacity.

When we come to deal with our powers and responsibilities, gentlemen of the Congress, let us not try to hide ourselves and protect ourselves against the people through the shifting of powers to the Executive, powers which belong to us.

I am trying to speak fundamentally. We are falling into another error in this country. We are undertaking to establish a sort of guardianship, each generation of the generations that are to come after us. That can not be done either. In the time allotted to me I can only state the basic reasons which underlie opposition to the amendment known as the Longworth amendment, which I understand is to be offered to the resolution. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts is recognized for one minute.

Mr. GIFFORD. Mr. Chairman, in this one minute I want to state that for years I have been considering this resolution. I have been brought to favor the "lame-duck" amendment idea, but now I very much regret that I have favored the "lame-duck" idea at the price of removing a limitation similar to that which we have always had in this Government. It is not a question to-day of "lame-duck" legislation. The debate has been and will be to the question as to whether or not we shall have two long, possibly continuous, sessions of Congress. While I am a friend of the amendment and probably shall vote for it because I can not retrace my steps so far, I want to appeal to the House to stay with their opinion of last year in a vote of 229 to 148, and listen to the words of Jefferson, quoted here to-day, that we vote our own independent thought, not considering the attitude of another body.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. JEFFERS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all Members who have been recognized be permitted five legislative days to extend their remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. All time has expired, and the Clerk will read the resolution for amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

That the following amendment to the Constitution be, and hereby is, proposed to the States, to become valid as a part of said Constitution when ratified by the legislatures of the several States as provided in the Constitution.

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. CELLER. May an amendment to the preamble be offered after the word "Constitution" in line 4, page 3, or must we wait until the first section has been read?

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment should be offered now.

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. CELLER: On page 3, line 4, after the word "Constitution," strike out the colon and insert "within seven years from the date of the submission hereof to the States by the Congress."

Mr. McKEOWN. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. McKEOWN. Has the amendment of the committee been offered?

The CHAIRMAN. The committee amendment is pending under the special rule.

Mr. McKEOWN. Is it proper at this time to attempt to amend the committee amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. That is proper.

Mr. RAMSEYER. Mr. Chairman, I do not know whether the colloquy between the Chair and the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. McKEOWN] is with respect to any question of policy or not. We did not get the gentleman's question.

Mr. McKEOWN. The question was whether or not the amendment to the committee amendment could be considered before the committee amendment was offered.

Mr. RAMSEYER. That was taken care of by the rule yesterday.

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Chairman, the only purpose in offering this amendment is to remove whatever there may be of ambiguity in the bill, as I see it, concerning the period during which ratification may be perfected.

Article V of the Constitution makes no provision with reference to the time within which ratification may be had, either by the State legislatures or by the conventions assembled in the States. If we do not put some limitation in this proposed amendment, seven years or some other reasonable provision, we might have a situation develop where one State would ratify this year, another State would ratify next year, and the procedure might continue along for 20 years. The question would then arise whether or not 20 years is a due and proper period of ratification within the spirit and letter of the Constitution.

We have a decision of the United States Supreme Court, a very important decision, and I hardly think we should act, or much less deliberate, upon this proposition unless some knowledge is brought to us concerning this decision.

When the eighteenth amendment was tested in the Supreme Court, the court held as to ratification in the case of Dillon v. Gloss (256 U. S. Repts.), that the 7-year provision which was attached to the eighteenth amendment was a reasonable provision, and then it went on, significantly, to make this statement——

Mr. RAMSEYER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CELLER. In just a moment, when I have finished this statement, I shall be very happy to:

Proposal and ratification—

As embodied in the fifth amendment—are not treated as unrelated acts, but as succeeding steps in a single endeavor, the natural inference being that they are not to be widely separated in time * * * the reasonable implication being that when proposed—

That is, when amendments are proposed—they are to be considered and disposed of presently * * * there is a fair implication that it must be sufficiently contemporaneous—

That is, the ratification—

in that number of States to reflect the will of the people in all sections at relatively the same period, which, of course, ratification scattered through a long series of years would not do.

I take it if through a long period of years there are separate ratifications by various States, that would not, in the spirit of this decision, be an appropriate ratification of the Constitution. In other words, the proposal of the amendment by the House and the Senate and the ratification by the States must be contemporaneous. They must be related one to the other, and there is good reason for this.

There must be some homogeneous will on the part of the entire people expressed, not necessarily at one moment but during a reasonable period of time, and the court has held that seven years can be deemed a reasonable period. We are safe, therefore, in providing for seven years. The court might hold that 10 years would not be a reasonable period. This might not be "presently" or "contemporaneous." So in order to remove ambiguity, I think it is, indeed, well to insert in this bill that the ratification by the legislatures must be consummated within a period of seven years.

It is very significant that most of the successful ratifications have occurred within four years. Prior to the eighteenth amendment there were 17 amendments, and 17 were adopted in one year.

I respectfully urge that the amendment be adopted.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. JEFFERS. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, if this amendment has any virtue, which I doubt, and I am not going to argue the merits of the amendment at this time, because I think it is very clear that it is out of place where it is being offered; but if the amendment has any virtue and is entitled to any consideration, I think it should be offered at the end of the resolution as an additional section, and then if it should be adopted it would be a part of the constitutional amendment.

As it is now offered it would only be a part of the proposal clause of the constitutional amendment but would not be in the constitutional amendment.

Mr. CELLER. Does the last clause of section 5 refer to sections 1 and 2?

Mr. JEFFERS. If the gentleman wants his amendment in the Constitution, it should go in as a new section, or section 6. As he has now offered it, it would be of no avail, as he is offering it as a part of the proposal clause and not as a part of the proposed constitutional amendment. Let me suggest to the gentleman that he withdraw his proposed amendment at this point and then offer it, if he desires to do so, at the point where it might properly be considered.

Mr. RAMSEYER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. The amendment proposed by the gentleman from New York is somewhat similar to the amendment that I intend to offer at the end of the resolution. The gentleman will probably recall the amendment that was offered by the gentleman from Tennessee, Mr. Garrett, when the resolution was up in 1928. The amendment I shall offer is the same as the Garrett amendment.

The gentleman from New York referred to the Supreme Court decision, which held valid a like provision in the eighteenth amendment. The eighteenth amendment carried that 7-year provision as section 3, and it was that provision that the Supreme Court held to be valid. The gentleman from New York has a good deal the same ideas about this that I have. I think we should play safe, inasmuch as the Supreme Court has held the provision valid. Would it not be better for the gentleman to withhold his amendment until after the resolution is read and offer it as a separate section?

Mr. CELLER. The gentleman will offer his amendment in section 6?

Mr. RAMSEYER. I intend to offer section 6 as it was in the resolution that passed the House a year ago word for word.

Mr. CELLER. I am inclined to withdraw my amendment in the light of what the gentleman from Iowa has said, but I want to be certain that if he offers it as a separate section, that our purpose will not be defeated by virtue of the fact that on page 3 of the bill it provides for the ratification by legislatures without specifying any limit at that point. If the gentleman is certain that it will not defeat our purpose, I am willing to withdraw my amendment.

Mr. RAMSEYER. I am confident—I will not say certain—that it is not subject to a point of order. Section 6 goes to the entire article, as to how it shall take effect. It appears in the eighteenth amendment as the last section of the amendment. It has appeared at the end of the resolution both times it was before the House in 1928 and again in 1929, and I am confident that is the place for it.

Mr. MICHENER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAMSEYER. I yield.

Mr. MICHENER. Yesterday, when the rule was up I inquired about section 6 of the resolution as it passed the House last year and gave notice that an amendment would be offered—is that the amendment to which the gentleman referred?

Mr. RAMSEYER. Yes.

Mr. MICHENER. The amendment included a provision——

Mr. PARSONS. Mr. Chairman, we can not hear what is going on.

Mr. RAMSEYER. The gentleman from Michigan wants to make sure that the amendment I am going to offer is the same he proposed yesterday in the debate on the rule.

Mr. PARSONS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAMSEYER. Yes.

Mr. PARSONS. I want to say that the legislatures of some States meet every two years, and some every four years. Why not make it four years or five years?

Mr. RAMSEYER. Well, the amendment is not up now. I shall be glad to discuss that when it is up. Right now, I am trying to get the gentleman from New York to withdraw his amendment and offer it at the end of the resolution.

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Chairman, I will withdraw my amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. McKEOWN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. Mr. Chairman, I have not attempted to take any time to discuss this resolution. The question of the "lame-duck" Congress is a question, to my mind, that is not the important thing in this resolution. Congress can change the time of its meeting when it sees fit. That is in the Constitution. It does not take a constitutional amendment to change it. But the vital thing that underlies this legislation is, in the event an election of the President of the United States is thrown into the House of Representatives that that election will be conducted by new Congressmen coming directly from the people, who have the interest of the people at heart when they come to cast their votes in that election.

What right has the House of Representatives to sit and determine an election at which perhaps more than half of the Members have gone down to defeat in the previous election of the President? The fundamental thing that underlies this amendment is to have the new Congress elect act, a Congress that will come so recently from the people as to respect the sentiment and votes of the people in the election of a President of the United States. In view of the fast-growing blocks in this country, in view of the fast-growing groups in this country, in view of the great difference in the ideas of economic conditions in this country whereby the interests of one particular part of the country are in opposition to another part of the country, it seems to me that this matter ought to be considered very carefully. If we ever have any trouble in this country, it is going to be over economic conditions, because the economic situation in one part of the country is different from that of other portions of the country, and what will help that part of the country is possibly detrimental to other portions of our country. The one great thing that we have to guard against in the future to preserve the country is going to be a determination on the part of the lawmakers of the country to do exact justice between all parts of the Union. It will be the obligation of men coming from my part of the country to see to it that proper laws are enacted to protect the interests of the great Northwest and the great Northeast, just as it is to see that fair and equitable laws are passed to protect the economic conditions of the people that I represent. That is going to be in the future the great contest in America for its preservation, and it will be the obligation of Congressmen to meet the economic requirements with fairness and justice to all parts of the country. I repeat, the underlying principle, the main thing in this resolution, is not the "lame-duck" feature, because Congress can change that under the Constitution as it is at the present time; but the main thing is the fact that the election for President may be thrown into the House of Representatives, and it should come before a Congress recently elected at the time when the election is held for the President of the United States. I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

Mr. LEHLBACH. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk:

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. LEHLBACH: Page 3, line 3, after the word "by," strike out the words "the legislatures of" and insert "conventions chosen for that purpose in."

Mr. LEHLBACH. Mr. Chairman, the purport of my amendment is so plain that it does not require any extended explanation. It substitutes for ratification by the legislatures of the States, ratification by conventions chosen for that purpose. Every amendment to the Constitution is of sufficient importance that it be dealt with upon its merits, to the exclusion of other questions, and not as a sort of petty chore for legislatures when matters are pending which to the legislators may seem to be more important. Particularly this amendment is entitled to careful consideration by the people and to action by the representatives of the people chosen by them after they have had an opportunity to give it careful consideration. Many questions are to be considered with respect to this resolution. Is it proper for a defeated, outgoing administration to prepare the Budget for the next administration; or, on the other hand, is a new administration with new department heads, the first thing it comes in, before it knows what its functions are, qualified to prepare estimates and the Budget. There are many questions of this sort in this resolution that are not apparent, but that can be brought out in debate in a campaign in which members of a convention are elected to pass upon them. As I say, every amendment to the Constitution merits consideration by itself, and not as a side issue by a legislature.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment. Very few people have anything whatever to do with the selection of delegates to a convention, and the people generally have very little voice in conventions. Delegates are usually selected through the manipulation of two or three politicians. After you elect the delegates and they go to a convention and the convention takes action, the convention is responsible to nobody. There is no one who can hold it responsible, but legislatures are responsible to the people for what they do. The members of a legislature are elected by the people. They are the chosen representatives of the people, and if they do not do as they promised the people they would do, the people have a means of redress by removing them from office in the next election. Therefore I am in favor of ratification of all amendments by legislatures chosen by the people and not by conventions, the acts of which would be the result of manipulation.

I can see where my friend, the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. LEHLBACH], would want it done by convention, because he has so long been a member of a party that manipulates through conventions, led by a few important leaders, of which he is one, that such method suits him; but I prefer for the people to have their little voice in all such matters, and I am strictly against ratification by the convention method.

Mr. LEHLBACH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. I yield.

Mr. LEHLBACH. Does not the gentleman utterly confuse a convention for the purpose of passing on a constitutional provision with a convention to make nominations?

Mr. BLANTON. Oh, no. No matter how it is chosen or for what purpose it is chosen, to whom is it responsible? It is responsible to nobody. It can do what it pleases and there is no power that can call it to account. A legislature can be called to taws by the people who elect it.

My views on this "lame-duck" resolution are known already. I do not have to debate this question again. I have debated this matter from the floor in several Congresses. The RECORD contains my views.

But I do want to say that I am uncompromisingly against the amendment that is going to be proposed from the floor to increase the term of office of a Member of the House of Representatives from two years to four years. One of the greatest safeguards which the American people now have to insure their wishes being observed is the fact that every one of us every two years has to go back and account to them for our stewardship and get our commission fresh again from the people. It is a great safeguard to the people, and I hope that if such amendment is passed here, attaching to the Norris proposal a 4-year term, that the people, exercising their sovereign rights, will cause their legislatures to refuse to ratify it, because it is safer for them to have Representatives come back to them and be indorsed every two years.

Mr. LEWIS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. I yield.

Mr. LEWIS. How about the 6-year term of Senators?

Mr. BLANTON. Oh, they are so far removed from the people already that the people have ceased to regard them as of very much value. [Laughter.] The people look to the Members of the House to carry out their wish and will. The people back home look to the Members of this House to protect them in their rights.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. I yield.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Is it not a fact that during the past few years the Senate of the United States has been far more progressive and more responsive to the will of the people than has the membership of the House? [Applause.]

Mr. BLANTON. I am not permitted to discuss the Senate. But, with all due respect, I know of a legislative body other than this House which is known better for its dignity than anything else, and, with all due respect to it, I have never heard it praised for economy until this year.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for three additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair desires to call the attention of the committee to the rule of the House in regard to speaking about the other body. The gentleman will proceed in order.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. I yield.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Inasmuch as I am the one who proposed the 4-year term, in view of what the gentleman just said about the United States Senate, I am wondering if the gentleman himself has changed his opinion since he was a candidate for that high office? [Laughter.]

Mr. BLANTON. That is a fair question. We all make mistakes. I made one. I discovered that I made a terrible mistake when I thought there was more honor over there than there is here.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. I yield.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. I would like to ask the gentleman if the contempt in which the gag rule is held by people throughout the country did not originate in the House of Representatives?

Mr. BLANTON. Oh, that is because we Members for a while permitted it. There is not any gag rule here now; not a bit. The most humble Member of this House has an opportunity, if he knows the rules, to get up here and express his sentiments at any time. If he does not learn the rules, he ought to get out of here, because without an intimate knowledge of the rules he is as helpless as a carpenter without a hammer and saw trying to build a house. I say this body is the real representative body of the people who look to us for proper redress.

What is the condition of the country now? The people are all dissatisfied. They want us to change unbearable conditions. The people are dissatisfied with the administration. They are highly displeased with the way public affairs have been mismanaged. They want us to stop wasting public money. They know how it has been spent by the White House. They do not like the policy of the retiring Secretary of the Treasury, who retires to-day. Who, aside from Secretary Mellon and probably Ogden Mills and probably the President, are as well off now as they were when Secretary Mellon went into office? Nobody. They are the only three that I know of who are as well off to-day as they were when that régime started. All the rest of us are worse off, and people are looking more to the House of Representatives right now for proper protection and proper relief than they are looking to any other agency in the United States.

Mr. HOWARD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. Certainly; but I only have three minutes.

Mr. HOWARD. I just wanted to ask the gentleman if he could point to any action that this House has taken since it assembled that is in harmony with the wishes of the people?

Mr. BLANTON. Oh, that is because the President has deluged us with his many hurried and desperate so-called relief measures. He has demanded that Congress pass them immediately. I am afraid that Congress has passed many of them blindly. But when we recover our equilibrium things will be different.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. GIFFORD. Mr. Chairman, this amendment has been considered each time the resolution has been considered. No amendment to the Constitution has ever been ratified in that manner. I took great pains to read from the Debates of 1803 why the twelfth amendment was not ratified by convention rather than by the States.

I want to quote the exact words of Mr. LUCE in the debate of last year.

> A State convention once having assembled is the embodiment of the sovereignty of the State, is a law unto itself, and may consider any question that it sees fit to take up.

It has always been the feeling of those who oppose the convention system of ratifying amendments that such convention might bring something else before it. We were told last year that the State of Illinois had long resisted a convention for any purpose lest the question of redistricting might be brought up. It has been stated that other States have resisted conventions because there were outside questions that would surely be brought before the convention.

Mr. LEHLBACH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GIFFORD. Yes.

Mr. LEHLBACH. Of course, a State convention may deal with anything after it is constituted, but a convention called for the purpose of amending the Constitution of the United States can only deal with that which is submitted by two-thirds of the votes of both Houses of Congress.

Mr. GIFFORD. That is a question which I hope the Supreme Court will settle some day, but up to date all authorities have resisted that argument. It is claimed that once a convention is assembled it can bring forward anything it pleases.

Mr. CELLER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GIFFORD. Yes.

Mr. CELLER. Is not the gentleman confusing the question of proposal with ratification? State conventions may propose and consider other matters at a ratification convention.

Mr. GIFFORD. That is it exactly.

Mr. CELLER. But that would not militate against the argument of the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. LEHLBACH], and it has nothing whatsoever to do with it, as far as I see. The States may propose, but as far as the deliberations of that convention are concerned they need only be limited, as far as a national amendment is concerned, to the ratification of it.

Mr. GIFFORD. The gentleman is exactly correct. I stated that once called into session they can propose any subject they may desire.

Mr. LEHLBACH. But the Constitution itself says that no amendment may be considered unless it is submitted by Congress.

Mr. GIFFORD. That may be as far as considering a national amendment is concerned, but I was speaking about any other proposal that might be made.

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. Chairman, may the amendment be again reported?

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Clerk will again report the amendment.

There was no objection.

The Clerk again read the amendment.

Mr. LOZIER. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment. I think there can be no question as to the power of Congress to determine in what manner a proposed amendment shall be ratified, whether it shall be submitted to the legislatures of the several States or to conventions called for that purpose. Dual plans are authorized, and Congress, in its wisdom and judgment, may designate which plan shall be followed.

I am opposed to this amendment, because I think it is absolutely unnecessary and because it would entail a tremendous expense upon the 48 States of the Union, an unnecessary expense which would increase the almost unbearable burdens under which the Commonwealths of this Nation are now staggering.

If this resolution were a new proposition that had not been the subject of discussion for more than a decade, if the newspapers of this Nation had not for many years discussed this proposition in all of its details, if it had not been discussed in Congress for 10 or 15 years, and if it had not already been sold to the American people there might be justification in the proposition to call conventions in the several States for the purpose of bringing this proposed amendment directly to the electorate, to the end that they might have an opportunity to inform themselves as to the provisions of this proposed amendment; but the pending resolution has been thoroughly discussed and its provisions thoroughly understood by the American people. Under our system of government and under our procedure for amending the Constitution, may I say that there never has been a constitutional amendment submitted for ratification that had not previously been the subject of years and, in many instances, decades of public discussion and disputation. No amendment has ever been submitted until the American people, through the Congress, by the press, from the platform and forum had not been advised as to the details of the proposed amendment. Consequently, the adoption of the amendment offered by the gentleman from New Jersey would lay upon 48 Commonwealths an enormous burden in the form of increased expenditures which would have to be raised by taxation, and if there ever was a time when this Congress should not place a burden of that kind upon the 48 American Commonwealths now is that time. No useful purpose could be served or promoted by submitting this amendment to conventions rather than to the legislatures of the several States, and would impose a heavy and unnecessary burden of expense on the States. Therefore I hope the committee will not adopt the amendment offered by the gentleman from New Jersey.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from New Jersey.

The amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

SECTION 1. The terms of the President and Vice President shall end at noon on the 24th day of January, and the terms of Senators and Representatives at noon on the 4th day of January, of the years in which such terms would have ended if this article had not been ratified; and the terms of their successors shall then begin.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. BANKHEAD: After the period, in line 11, page 3, insert a colon and the following: "Provided, That the terms of Representatives shall end as herein provided every fourth year after they are chosen by the people of the several States."

Mr. LOZIER. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order against the amendment that it is not germane to the bill or to the section which has been read, and in support of my point of order I call the attention of the Chair to the decisions upon similar amendments to similar resolutions in this House, especially the decision by Chairman LEHLBACH, which is printed in the House Manual, volume 31, section 952 (a), in which the decisions of Speakers and Chairmen of the Committee of the Whole House on this question are collated, analyzed, and applied, and from which it conclusively appears that this amendment is not germane either to the section or to the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Alabama desire to be heard on the point of order?

Mr. BANKHEAD. I do, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Chairman, in as few words as I may properly do so, I desire very earnestly to ask the indulgence of the Chair while I undertake to show that while a former decision has been made upon this proposition, presented in a somewhat different form, yet, in my opinion, the conclusions reached by the then Chairman of the committee are unsound.

The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. LOZIER] has interposed the point of order against this amendment that it is in contravention of the following rule:

And no motion or proposition on a subject different from that under consideration shall be admitted under color of amendment.

I realize, of course, as I said in the beginning, that I am in the position of an attorney appealing for a new trial, as it were; but I have undertaken to give some consideration to the philosophy of these rules and to the common sense upon which they are based, and I feel that times do arise in the history of a legislator when he is justified in appealing not only to the judgment of the Chair but sometimes to the judgment of his colleagues upon a question of this importance; and, of course, the importance of the question that is now presented is not the merits of this amendment but the proper construction of the rules of the House as to the germaneness of this proposition.

Now, what does this resolution undertake to do, Mr. Chairman? It will be observed that the original proposition, the Senate bill, proposed an amendment to the Constitution of the United States fixing the commencement of the terms of President and Vice President and Members of Congress and fixing the time of the assembling of Congress, and then followed the Senate resolution. The House committee, in its wisdom, struck out the entire Senate bill and has substituted in its stead an entirely different proposition, and it does not undertake, in the title of the House bill which we are now considering, to propose an amendment to the Constitution fixing the commencement of the terms of President and Vice President; but, upon the contrary, it provides—

That the following amendment to the Constitution be, and hereby is, proposed to the States, to become valid as a part of said Constitution when ratified.

So that in its essence, Mr. Chairman, the amendment here, in its various sections, is proposing a new amendment to the Constitution of the United States in terms therein set out.

There is nothing said in this House resolution about the time when any term shall commence. Upon the contrary, section 1, to which I am now addressing myself—and I desire to read it and have it incorporated in the RECORD in connection with this argument—provides:

The terms of the President and Vice President shall end at noon on the 24th day of January, and the terms of Senators and Representatives at noon on the 4th day of January, of the years in which such terms would have ended if this article had not been ratified; and the terms of their successors shall then begin.

So what is the essence of the problem with which we are dealing? What is the language of the bill itself? What is the material out of which this proposition is constructed? What are the essential features in connection with it? Why, it deals wholly and exclusively with the ending of the terms of three different sets of persons, President, Vice President, United States Senators and Representatives in Congress.

They say it is not germane under the rules of the House, where a proposition here is proposed fixing the ending of the term of Representatives to undertake to extend that principle of the ending of a term and say when, in the judgment of the House, it shall end. This is the crux of this whole proposition and why, upon a sound basis of reasoning, is it not fundamentally germane to the issues involved in this section?

The Chair, of course, is familiar with the proposition that where there are a number of subjects set out in a measure that an amendment setting up some different phase of the same proposition—that is, the essentials of the proposition—may be held to be germane and ought to be held germane for the consideration of the committee.

My friend from Missouri cited some precedents that had been cited by the then Chairman LEHLBACH in his opinion, which appears in the Manual, but I can also cite for the consideration of the Chair—and I am not going to undertake to elaborate them, because I want to conserve the time of the committee as much as possible—well-considered opinions, delivered by able Chairmen of the Committee of the Whole, which, it seems to me, sustain the fundamental soundness of my attitude upon this proposition.

In Hinds' Precedents, volume 5, section 5582, this principle is announced:

To a bill proposing one mode of arranging the presidential succession, an amendment proposing a joint resolution for submitting a constitutional amendment on a plan differing as to details was held germane.

Now, when I merely seek to extend by amendment the term of a Representative, surely that is more germane than the proposition proposing a joint resolution for submitting a constitutional amendment on a plan differing as to details.

What is the effect of the amendment? They will argue that it merely fixes the commencement of these terms. As a matter of fact, when you analyze the effect of it, it is going to be a shortening of the term of a Representative by two months. How ridiculous it appears to me, in the matter of cold reasoning, that to a bill shortening the term it would be beyond the scope of the rules of the House to offer an amendment extending the time of a Representative, or saying when it should end.

That is all that is involved here. The whole subject relates to the end of the term, and my proposal simply provides, as it was read from the Clerk's desk, when the term should end. That is the exact language—

That the term of the Representatives shall end at noon on the 4th day of January.

My amendment provides that it shall end every fourth year.

When this matter was up for consideration on the floor of the House, when one of these decisions was rendered by the same Chairman, the gentleman from New Jersey—I want to read the exact language of a statement made by a former Member of this House—and I say this without any criticism of the ability of my present colleagues, this man had the most luminous intellect of any man that I have come in contact with in my service, a man who was as familiar with the philosophy of the rules of the House as any man who has served here.

He sustained the reasoning that I am now suggesting. He said:

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I should like to say that I am addressing myself purely to the parliamentary situation and in no way to the merits of the amendment, because I do not happen to be in sympathy with the amendment.

We have here before us a resolution which contains three distinct, separate, and unrelated propositions. Sections 1 and 2, standing alone, would be complete. In other words, the integrity of those sections would not be affected in any way if the House should conclude to strike out all the remainder. So of section 3 and so of section 4. Therefore it would seem to fall within the line of decisions that where a measure contains two or more subjects it is in order to offer a third subject of the same class. I call the Chair's attention to citations from the Manual, which state:

"Thus, the following have been held to be germane: To a bill admitting several Territories into the Union, an amendment adding another Territory; to a bill providing for the construction of buildings in each of two cities, an amendment providing for similar buildings in several other cities; to a resolution embodying two distinct phases of international relationship, an amendment embodying a third."

In other words, Mr. Garrett, by asserting the proposition that here was the resolution that in three essentials undertook to amend different sections of the Constitution of the United States—and in this which I am setting out it does not even undertake a departure in undertaking to set up a separate section dealing with this matter—held it might well be; but I am merely undertaking to add language that will continue for two years the ending of the terms which are set out in the resolution which we are now considering.

I am not going to argue the merits of the amendment here now. I would be very glad to undertake to do that if in the wisdom of the Chair this matter could properly be presented to the committee for consideration. The purpose of it is to extend the term of the Members of Congress from two to four years, and that is the object I am seeking to effect by proposing this amendment. I could cite other authorities upon it, but the matter has been fully discussed, and that is all I believe I care to say upon the proposition.

Mr. LEHLBACH. Mr. Chairman, I do not desire at this time to discuss the merits of the point of order, but to correct an error on the part of the gentleman from Alabama. He referred to a decision in the last Congress as a decision of the Chairman of the committee, but by reason of the appeal from the Chair to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union the decision of the Chair was merged in the decision of the House itself.

Mr. BANKHEAD. But I think we have a considerably different personnel in the present House.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, unless the Chair has made up his mind, I would like to be heard for a few minutes. Otherwise I do not care to take up the time of the committee in discussing this mooted question of germaneness.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would be glad to hear the gentleman.

Mr. STAFFORD. The Chair will notice that the pending resolution in no wise seeks to change the term of Representatives as the Constitution, in section 2 of Article I, provides, or the time of Senators as the Constitution, in section 3 of Article I, provides, but merely seeks to fix the date when the terms of Representatives and Senators and the term of the President of the United States shall begin. In no particular does it seek to change the 2-year term of Representatives as provided by the Constitution, the 6-year as provided for Senators, or the 4-year term as provided for the President. It merely seeks to change the date when their terms shall begin. In no way does it seek to lengthen their term other than as it may be affected by the date of the commencement of that term; and with all due respect to the logic of the distinguished gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD] I respectfully contend that it is rather sophistry to argue that because merely the date is attempted to be affected when the term will begin, that, ergo, we have authority to change other substantive provisions of the Constitution which pertain to the fixed length of terms of Representatives, Senators, and the President.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes.

Mr. BANKHEAD. The gentleman constantly refers to the fact that this seeks to change the term when it shall begin. I would like the gentleman to refer to any clause in my proposed amendment which does that. On the contrary, the whole proposition is based on the idea of when terms shall end.

Mr. STAFFORD. The words are coterminous, so far as the language of the section is concerned. It says that the terms shall end on a certain date. True; but the term that ends is the beginning of another term, and in no wise here in this resolution is there an attempt made to extend the length of the terms of the respective officials whose terms of office are sought to be terminated, except in one instance only, and that is the ending and the inferential beginning of the succeeding term.

I direct attention to the fact that this bill also affects the method of electing the President in case there is a vacancy either by death or by some happening that may occur after the President elect has been elected by the Electoral College, or in case the Vice President has not qualified to fill that position. The gentleman relies for his major support on the argument that his amendment shall be in order because this resolution relates to more than two subject matters. It is true that it relates to more than two subject matters, namely, the change of the date when the terms of the Representatives and Senators shall begin or end—I care not so much which way he wishes to refer to it—and of the President; and also how the office of the President and Vice President shall be filled in case of certain eventualities, but the very basis for the rule of germaneness as supported by the later decisions of the Chair is that the House should be protected against the consideration of any proposal unless it may appear as a reasonable presumption that that proposal has first received the deliberate consideration of the committee. No one can reasonably claim that this committee, whose one purpose has been to seek to terminate the hold-over sessions of Congress after an election, has given by any phrase or clause in the Senate proposal, or in the House substitute, consideration to the lengthening of the terms of Representatives or Senators, or of the President. The mere fact that this resolution embodies two distinct proposals does not give a Member the right to add another proposal foreign to that which has been considered by the committee and which is being now considered by the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union. That is the very fundamental principle of the rule of germaneness.

Otherwise the House would never come to an agreement on any proposal. There is one thing for consideration, as submitted by the Senate resolution and as submitted by the substitute offered by the committee, and that is merely these proposals changing or ending the date of the terms of Representatives, Senators, and President when this proposed amendment to the Constitution is ratified. Other than that, the question is foreign. The Chair will find many decisions where the Chair has held that although the bill relates to 2, 3, or 4 distinct, substantive propositions you can not engraft, for the consideration of the House or the committee, another distinct, substantive matter that has no direct relation to the matters proposed.

The rule of germaneness is for the protection of the House. Being for the protection of the House it is for the protection of the legislative integrity of the House in safeguarding against ill-advised, unconsidered legislation that has not been given consideration by the committee, or can not be presumed to have been given consideration by the committee.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. I yield.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I have great respect for the gentleman's opinion as a parliamentarian, but I do not believe that upon reconsideration the gentleman would definitely take the position that the Chairman of the committee, in undertaking to construe a question of germaneness, should have put upon him the burden of undertaking to determine what was in the mind of the committee reporting the bill, but, upon the contrary, he should be confined strictly to the language contained within the four corners of the document. That is the only definite expression of what the committee had in mind.

Mr. STAFFORD. I agree with the gentleman's statement that the Chairman should consider only what is within the purview of the definitive propositions that are submitted to the House. What are those definitive propositions? There are only two. One, when the present term of Representatives, Senators, and the President shall end, after ratification of this proposed amendment; and, two, the filling of the vacancy of President, in case of death or otherwise, in case of some unforeseen occurrence. Those are the two substantive propositions.

Now, it is proposed to bring up a question which has not been under consideration in general debate, which has not been given any consideration by the committee, which has not been given any consideration at any time, so far as I recall—the question of lengthening the term of Representatives.

Mr. KELLER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. I yield.

Mr. KELLER. Is it not true that this amendment shortens the length of the term?

Mr. STAFFORD. It only shortens the length of the term in that contingency when the amendment has been adopted, and must necessarily shorten the term. Otherwise there could be no change in the date as established by law when our Government began.

It was a legislative anachronism that March 4 was determined upon as the date for the beginning of the Government and of the congressional terms and senatorial terms. Now we are seeking to change that one date, March 4, and bring it back to January 4, and to that extent only, after this amendment, the terms of Representatives and Senators will be shortened, and thereafter the provisions of the Constitution, to which I have referred, as to the terms of Representatives and Senators and President will be applicable, namely, 2 years, 6 years, and 4 years.

Mr. KELLER. Will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. STAFFORD. I yield.

Mr. KELLER. If this amendment does shorten the term, is it not equally true that it may lengthen the term?

Mr. STAFFORD. Oh, yes; in this one particular: It was once proposed that instead of having March 4 as the date when Congress should begin its work it should be April 30. All this arose as the result of bad weather conditions during President Taft's inauguration, when we had a tremendous snowstorm and the proceedings had to be held indoors. It was then proposed that we would extend the time until April 30. If in the judgment of the House they wish to change the date from March 4 to April 30 or May 4, that is within their province, but you can not effect something that is not under consideration, namely, the lengthening of the terms of Representatives, President, and Senators.

Mr. LOZIER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. I yield.

Mr. LOZIER. If I understood the gentleman from Alabama when he interrogated the gentleman from Wisconsin, the gentleman said this section dealt with the time the terms should end, and nothing with reference to the time when the terms should begin. The last sentence provides:

> And the terms of their successors shall then begin.

The section not only provides when the term shall end, but it provides when the term shall begin.

Mr. STAFFORD. If the gentleman will read section 2, instead of stating that the term shall end, it says the term shall begin.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is ready to rule.

The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD] offered an amendment to section 1 of the resolution in words as follows:

> Provided, That the terms of the Representatives shall end as herein provided, every fourth year after they are chosen by the people of the several States.

The gentleman from Missouri raised a question under a point of order as to the germaneness of the amendment to the pending resolution. The amendment offered by the gentleman from Alabama seeks, as the Chair has stated, to amend section 1 of the pending resolution by lengthening the terms for which Members of the House of Representatives are elected. Article I, section 2, of the Constitution of the United States, provides—

> That the House of Representatives shall be composed of Members chosen every second year by the people of the several States.

Therefore, the amendment offered by the gentleman from Alabama seeks to amend this section of the Constitution by electing the Members to the House of Representatives for a term of four years instead of for a term of two years.

The present section 1 of the joint resolution is one which seeks to amend Article I, section 4, of the Constitution, which is:

The Congress shall assemble at least once in every year, and such meeting shall be on the first Monday in December unless they shall by law appoint a different day.

The pending resolution does not, therefore, seek to change by legislation the terms of the Members of the House of Representatives, with the exception of the change which must necessarily follow if the amendment is ratified by the several States and becomes a part of the Constitution of the United States, in shortening the terms of Members for one Congress.

The subject of the resolution is for the time of the convening of the Congress. The subject of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Alabama is for the lengthening of the terms of the Members of the House of Representatives. Clearly, in the mind of the present occupant of the chair, the amendment falls under the purview of section 7 of Rule XVI of the House of Representatives, which is:

And no motion or proposition on a subject different from that under consideration shall be amendment under color of amendment.

Within the past four years, upon two previous occasions, the germaneness of a similar amendment, similar in substance, the phraseology just a little different, to a similar resolution, has been ruled upon by the then Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union. In view of section 7, Rule XVI, of the House of Representatives, as to the germaneness of amendments, and in view of the previous decisions of the former Chairmen, the Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, I respectfully appeal from the decision of the Chair and ask to be recognized.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, of course I have, as I stated in the beginning, profound respect for the necessity of following, as far as they are consistent and logical, the precedents that have been established by the decisions of Chairmen of the Committee of the Whole. I have that character of respect for the present able presiding officer over this committee and for the views of the distinguished gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. LEHLBACH], who was in the chair on both occasions before when this question was presented. But, nevertheless, gentlemen, without undertaking to repeat the argument I attempted to present to the Chair upon the presentation of this question, it appears to me that the former Chairman who sustained the point of order and the present Chairman of this committee have certainly made a very technical construction of the rules of the House as affecting this proposition.

The able Chairman in stating his views said that this matter dealt with the question of changing the times of the beginning of terms. With all due respect, it appears to me the Chairman of the committee was improvident in making that statement, for, as I asserted in the beginning, this whole question is based upon the proposal to amend the Constitution of the United States. I say it is consistent with the precedents of this House and it is consistent with the terms of the phraseology of the section we are now considering to hold that we are dealing with the proposition of the ending of terms of three different classes of men. The committee presenting this resolution has undertaken to assert its convictions upon that question. I contend that the Committee of the Whole has the right to differ with the conclusions of the committee with reference to the ending of the terms and that there should be submitted to the judgment of the Committee of the Whole the question as to whether or not it has an independent opinion as to when these terms should end.

I do this with the greatest and most profound respect for my friend, the present Chairman, and the former Chairman, but I am so thoroughly convinced of the correctness of my attitude upon this question and that it is a question of the highest privilege, else I would not assume to appeal from the decision of the Chairman of my own committee. There is no politics involved. It is a more profound question than that. It is a question involving the Constitution of the United States, and when as Members of this House we go to dealing with that instrument certainly we ought to have some privilege of expressing our independent views upon it in terms other than already laid down for us to follow by the committee presenting it and only asking a change as to the ending of the terms there mentioned. [Applause.]

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I ask recognition in opposition to the motion of the gentleman from Alabama.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. Chairman, I rise in favor of the motion of the gentleman from Alabama.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas is entitled to prior recognition.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I submit to my colleagues of the committee that the opinion of the Chair is clear, distinct, able, profound, and follows the decisions of previous chairmen of this House for several years, and especially follows an appeal to the House where the House itself upheld the decision of the Chair. The Chair has fairly stated that the proposal brought in by the committee does not in any way seek to amend the article of the Constitution which the amendment offered by the gentleman from Alabama seeks to amend.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Why does it not deal with that proposition?

Mr. BLANTON. It is an entirely distinct proposition. There is nothing in the Norris proposal here which seeks to extend the terms of Representatives in the House from two to four years. It provides that there shall be a meeting of the House, after the election, on January 4; but after that first meeting the term of office of every Representative of this House remains just the same, namely, two years. There is no change in the Constitution. They are elected in November for their term to begin on January 4, and it extends after that for two full years until January 4.

Mr. JEFFERS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. Yes.

Mr. JEFFERS. And the only reason for any change whatever on the part of the committee reporting this resolution was to enable that machinery to become effective. That is all.

Mr. BLANTON. Certainly. I want to say this: Our friend from Alabama, whom we all love and respect, is one of the finest parliamentarians in this House. I had hoped that he would be up here saying that "regardless of the merits of the amendment he would support the Chair in his honest ruling."

Mr. BANKHEAD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. I have followed the distinguished gentleman from Alabama. I sincerely wish that it were so that I could follow him now. But I am forced to a different conclusion. I have seen him on occasions when he was in favor of a proposition stand up and uphold the Chair even though my friend may have differed from the honest opinion of the Chair.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Now, will my friend yield?

Mr. BLANTON. Certainly.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I appreciate the complimentary reference the gentleman has made to me, but I resent, as a personal reflection, the statement the gentleman made that if I were not the proponent of this proposition I would be voting otherwise. [Applause.]

Mr. BLANTON. I did not mean that as a reflection. I have a high regard for my friend from Alabama, and I know he is honest and sincere. He wants his amendment submitted to the House; but I do know the gentleman is in favor of upholding the Chair, whether the Chair is Democratic or Republican, when the Chair is honest and sincere and is backed up by the precedents of the House, as is true in the present case.

I know that there is a desire on the part of many Members here this afternoon to have the amendment of the gentleman from Alabama considered so that they may have an opportunity to discuss it on its merits. I would not be adverse to that discussion but for the fact that to overrule the decision of the Chair would be to establish a very unwise precedent, one which on the last occasion when a similar appeal was made from the identical decision the House refused to establish. Expediency may cause you to change and establish as a precedent just the opposite of that already established by the House, but I want to register my protest against it.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is, Shall the decision of the Chair stand as the judgment of the committee?

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. BLANTON) there were—ayes 56, noes 106.

So the decision of the Chair did not stand as the judgment of the committee.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, I ask recognition in favor of the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, I hardly think it necessary for me to add anything whatever to what I have already stated with reference to the purpose of this amendment. We have now submitted to the judgment of the committee the question of the wisdom of the amendment. I did not undertake to argue the merits of the amendment in presenting the statement which I made to the Chairman of the committee.

I want to be entirely candid with the committee in stating to you that the prime reason that actuated me in undertaking to raise this question four years ago in the House of Representatives was based upon the constant and unremitting inquiries submitted to me by my constituents at home in my district, as well as in other districts, women and men of intelligence and of character and of patriotism, why it was, taking me as an illustration, I had to run every two years in a primary and every two years in a general election.

Why, we were only sworn in on the 4th day of last March in our present term, and on yesterday I had to file my notice with the Democratic committee in Alabama as a candidate for reelection, one year or less than one year after my present term of office began.

My friends, it is my solemn opinion that the people of America will ratify this feature of the amendment if it stays on the resolution. It is in conformity with principles of sound, common sense. [Applause.]

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BANKHEAD. Yes; I will be pleased to yield.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. I want to ask the gentleman if he is not thoroughly convinced in his own mind that if this amendment is attached to the resolution, it means the death of the resolution?

Mr. BANKHEAD. I may say to my friend that I am glad that he has asked me this question. I am not of that type of representative of the American people in the House of Representatives, representing a constituency of the character of mine, that wants to come here and vote upon questions of this sort because somebody else, somewhere else, has some form of opinion about this proposition. [Applause.] I am earnestly and sincerely in favor of this proposition, because I believe in its soundness, because I believe in its sense, because I believe the American people get tired of being constantly harassed with these continual biennial elections, and because I feel that in no sense will it impair the proposition that this is the popular branch of the people in the Government of the United States.

This is my answer to my distinguished friend. I have great respect, of course, for the opinions of the able Senators who are back of this other proposition, but as long as I am in Congress—and I submit this to the candid judgment of my friend—I am going to stand here and vote what I think is right regardless of any outside considerations of policy. I think this is what we ought to do. I intend to vote for the Norris resolution, if my amendment is defeated.

Mr. MORTON D. HULL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BANKHEAD. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. MORTON D. HULL. Would it make any difference to the gentleman from Alabama whether the 4-year term of a Representative coincided with the presidential-election year?

Mr. BANKHEAD. That is another argument that appeals to a great many people. When you go out, as we are going out this year, to make a presidential campaign for the people of America by popular vote to express their judgment not only upon the candidates but upon the policies of the Nation, I think it is entirely reasonable that we should have a Congress to carry out the policy of the successful presidential candidate.

Mr. MORTON D. HULL. Does the gentleman believe that is the way it would operate? The ratification might come at a time when that would not follow.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I am not considering here question of political expediency, I will say to my friend.

Mr. MORTON D. HULL. No; that is not it at all.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I misunderstood the gentleman.

Mr. MORTON D. HULL. It may happen in the ratification that the amendment would go into effect so as to make the 4-year term of the Representatives not coincide with the beginning of the presidential term. The amendment of the gentleman has not taken care of that phase of it.

Mr. BANKHEAD. That is a proposition that will have to take care of itself. I could not undertake, in a proposition of this sort, to work out all contingencies that may arise in a matter of this sort, because we do not know when the amendment will be ratified. [Applause.]

Mr. LOZIER. Mr. Chairman, I am sorry that this amendment must be considered and determined in the atmosphere which has just developed in this Chamber, but which situation I had no part in creating. May I say that for the gentleman who offered the pending amendment, Mr. BANKHEAD, of Alabama, I have not only a profound respect but an unfeigned affection, because of his sterling qualities of mind and heart. I regard him not only as a valuable legislator but a man of absolute sincerity, robust character, and integrity of purpose. And in opposing this amendment I want it distinctly understood that I recognize the right of the gentleman from Alabama to propose and aggressively advocate its adoption. In so doing he is not only within his rights, but he is performing his duty as he sees it. He should not be criticized, nor should his motives be impugned, because I am sure he is actuated by the same lofty motives which I have always found motivated him in his official and personal conduct. [Applause.]

But I can not bring myself to approve this amendment, and I am constrained to oppose it, notwithstanding my respect for and appreciation of the gentleman who proposed it. In my opinion the amendment strikes at important safeguards in our scheme of government, namely, the provision which gives the people the right to change their Representatives every two years if they are not satisfied with the manner in which they have discharged their duties. The provisions fixing the term of Representatives at two years and the term of Senators at six years were the result of a compromise in the convention that framed our Federal Constitution. There is a profound philosophy underlying this arrangement.

The House is the popular branch of the American Congress, at least in theory, and that was the conception entertained by our constitutional fathers. Taxation and revenue measures must originate in the House. Those who wrote our Constitution zealously guarded the exercise of the taxing power, and vested that authority in the House composed of Members who came fresh from the people every two years, and who would be disposed to exercise these powers wisely and moderately, because they would have to return to the people every two years for a new commission or election.

Our constitutional forefathers saw fit to write into the Constitution that the Members of the House must come every two years fresh from the people, and every two years they should return to the people to give an account of their stewardship, so the electorate would have an opportunity every two years to pass judgment upon the legislative record of their Representatives, and to approve or disapprove the policies which their Representatives supported or opposed, with the further right to change their Representatives, if, in the judgment of the people, they failed to reflect the views and wishes of their constituents with reference to legislative proposals. Inasmuch as the Senators have a 6-year term and need not account to their constituents for six years, it is the more important that the people should have Representatives in the House who well understood that if they were faithless to their constituents they would be replaced at the end of two years.

The longer the term of a public official the more liable he is to become indifferent to the interests of his constituents, and the greater the temptation to betray those who gave him a commission to represent them. It would be exceedingly unwise to change this system and to remove or postpone this responsibility and accounting to their constituents. If the Bankhead amendment becomes a part of the Constitution it will tremendously reduce the power of the common people to work their will and will make Representatives less responsive to public opinion and more indifferent to the welfare of the people they are supposed to represent.

It is a wise system which requires every Representative to go to his constituents every two years, render an account of his stewardship, and allow the people to pass favorable or unfavorable judgment on his record. If a Representative is faithless to his constituents, under the present system the people may repudiate him after a 2-year term; but under the plan proposed in the Bankhead amendment a faithless Representative will have four years in which to misrepresent his people. Under the present system a faithful Representative may with reason expect a reelection. The present plan enables a district to retire an unsatisfactory Representative at the end of a 2-year term but also enables them to keep a faithful servant in office for a long term of years if they are satisfied with his legislative activities.

This House is supposed to be a progressive body, but our reputation as such will suffer severely if we incorporate the Bankhead amendment in the pending resolution. I think it exceedingly unwise, and, may I say, unfair, for Members of this House to incorporate in this resolution a provision which is intended to lengthen the terms of Members of Congress from two to four years. This would be entirely foreign to the purposes of the pending resolution. The proposition to lengthen the term of Representatives has not been advocated in or out of Congress, and there is no public demand for such a change. Why engraft this proposal on the pending resolution? Why take advantage of the popularity of the pending resolution to extend the term of Representatives in Congress? If the proposal in the Bankhead amendment is sound and there is a public demand for the proposed change, why not present it as a separate resolution and let it stand or fall on its own merits? It should not be tacked on to the Norris resolution, because combining the two propositions will, in my opinion, defeat the Norris resolution, for which there is a widespread public demand.

The proposal to abolish the "lame-duck" session of Congress has been discussed for many years, and there is a nation-wide demand for this amendment. On the other hand, the proposal to extend the terms of Members of Congress from two to four years has not been discussed in Congress, in the press, on the platform, or elsewhere; and why should that controversial subject be linked with the pending resolution to abolish the short sessions of Congress and to provide for presidential succession? If the friends of the Bankhead proposal think it should be submitted as an amendment to the Constitution, they should bring it forward as a separate and distinct proposition, so it can be considered on its merits or demerits, instead of tying it onto the Norris resolution, the effect of which will undoubtedly be to defeat the pending resolution and make its ratification by the States impossible.

I am opposed to extending the term of Representatives from two to four years. I will vigorously oppose this proposal, not only as an amendment to the pending bill but also if the proposition is presented in a separate resolution. I am convinced that it is not for the best interests of the American people to make this change. It is an insidious attack against popular government and the rights of the common people. The terms of Representatives should remain two years, which will continue in the people the power to change their Representatives every two years if they so desire. [Applause.]

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. Every Democratic Member in this Chamber who superseded a Republican indicts himself as being the unworthy successor of the Republican whom he defeated if he votes for this amendment to make the term of office of Members of the House of Representatives four years instead of two. [Applause.] I have seen in my term of service here two distinct occasions when a Republican administration, with the President having the support of both Houses, was defeated by the people in their might, so far as the House of Representatives is concerned, when they turned the Republican majority out and put in control a Democratic majority. Are you going, by your vote now, to say that the sovereign people of America were wrong in superseding the Republican majority?

A MEMBER. What do you say?

Mr. STAFFORD. I say no. [Applause.] The voice of the people in the election of their representatives is the supreme law of the land. I am a believer in the right of the people to have their say every two years to determine the personnel of this body, regardless of my personal convenience. There is no one in the House who during the last 28 years has had to fight more strenuously for his place here than have I against socialistic organizations, not alone in my home district but those of the entire country.

My people, too, have said to me, "Why not lengthen the term of office?" and I have replied to them that I bottom my position on the fundamental principle of the mandate of the popular will of the people to elect their House of Representatives every two years. I am perfectly willing to go back to the people every two years and give them an accounting of my service here.

This proposal is merely a bid for the convenience of Members. It will be subversive of the principle of popular government, of going back to the people and giving an accounting every two years.

Let me give you another instance. Back in 1910, under the administration of President Taft, after the Republicans had been in control for 16 years of all branches of the Government, the people turned the Republicans out on the tariff issue and the Democrats came in, so far as the House of Representatives was concerned. Are you going to say that Speaker Clark and a majority of the people did not have the right to say that the House of Representatives should be changed in its political complexion when the ruling party was in opposition to the will of the people?

This is fundamental. Do you Democrats now in control of the House of Representatives want to enact an unpopular piece of legislation, want to kill this resolution entirely, which seeks only one purpose, and that is to do away with the irresponsibility attendant on the hold-over session of Congress, by voting to lengthen the term of office of the Members of the House of Representatives to four years?

I am not in sympathy with any such policy. I would rather go through the rigors of campaigns every two years, and have my votes held up to scrutiny, close scrutiny, of a well-informed popular electorate than merely to satisfy my own convenience by sitting here for four years.

Mr. PARSONS. Is it not a fact that the people will have the right to pass on this in conventions or legislatures?

Mr. STAFFORD. It means the defeat of the one objective of this resolution, and that is to do away with the hold-over sessions of Congress. You may defeat this resolution, but I hope you will not do it with this undemocratic amendment.

Mr. RAMSEYER. Mr. Chairman, if Members of the House can get over their excitement and calm themselves, I should like them to listen to me for a very few minutes. I want you all to understand the situation. Of course, every once in a while when we have a large representation here, as we have now, we develop a psychological situation.

Mr. KELLER. A psychological complex.

Mr. RAMSEYER. Or a psychological complex, as the gentleman from Illinois suggests. Respectfully I suggest the House is in what you might term a state of mob psychology at the present time. We had this amendment before us two years ago to extend the terms of Members of the House from two to four years. I made the point of order against the amendment when it was offered in 1928, and that point of order was sustained by the Chairman and the Chairman in turn was, on appeal, sustained by the Committee of the Whole. I think the present chairman was right in his ruling a moment ago, but the judgment of the Committee of the Whole is different, and the amendment is before us. Now, I want you to know just what the situation is. If you vote this Bankhead amendment on this resolution you can not get a separate vote upon it in the House when we rise, because this resolution will be reported with the House amendment as amended. I am opposed to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Alabama. I would be opposed to it as a separate proposition. I am opposed to it on this particular resolution. I am opposed to amending the Constitution to make the terms of the Members of the House four years.

Mr. Chairman, that is all I care to say at this time. I simply want the RECORD to show my opposition to this amendment.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAMSEYER. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. I call my friend's attention to the fact in respect to his reference to mob psychology that it was largely the vote of his colleagues on the Republican side, many of whom are against the Norris amendment, who through expediency helped to overrule the decision of the Chair. [Cries of "No!"]

Mr. RAMSEYER. Mr. Chairman, I contradict the statement of the gentleman from Texas. I was here and I saw the vote, and I know that more gentlemen rose on the Democratic side to overrule the decision of the Chair than on the Republican side.

Mr. MICHENER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAMSEYER. Yes.

Mr. MICHENER. As bearing upon the matter just stated by the gentleman from Texas, let me refer to the debates in the first session of the Fifty-ninth Congress, volume 40, page 827, where the Senator from Nebraska, Mr. NORRIS, then a Member of the House, introduced a proposed constitutional amendment in the House, section 2 of which provides, "the term of office of Members of House of Representatives shall be four years." This was on June 20, 1906. The same constitutional amendment provided for the election of United States Senators by direct vote of the people. Considerable debate was had on the floor of the House on the proposal. At that time the distinguished Senator was very much of the opinion that the terms of Representatives should be changed from two years to four years, and it seems to me that it would be presuming much to suggest that the learned Senator had changed his mind on this proposition. A part of the argument presented by the Senator at that time is as follows:

> The second proposition contained in the proposed amendment to the Constitution, extending the term of office of Members of the House of Representatives from two years to four years, is practically a new question, although the injustice both to the Member and to the country in general on account of this short term has long been recognized.
> Under the existing provision Members of the House of Representatives are elected in November, but do not actually begin their official duties until a year from the following December. Their term of office has practically half expired before they take the oath. Before they are fairly started in the work for which they were elected they were plunged into a campaign for renomination. Their attention and energy are diverted from their official duties in the Capital City to the local political contests in their respective districts. This is an injustice to the Member and is likewise unfair to the people he represents.
>
> A longer service than two years is required in the House before a Member can expect to have any voice in the actual solving of national legislative problems or in the shaping of the Government's policies. It is a recognized and well-known fact that the congressional district which changes its Representatives every two years has practically no voice in national legislation.
> In a country like ours, controlled by political parties, each standing for different and sometimes antagonistic policies of government, it is but just and fair that sufficient time be given for the party successful before the people to properly inaugurate and fairly test the policies and principles for which that party stood in the election. Two years is not sufficient time for any party to inaugurate the policies so approved by the people and give them sufficient trial to fairly and justly test their effectiveness and wisdom. Under our present system a party placed in power as a result of a campaign and election on some plain issue will often find itself dethroned and cast out before it has had time to enact into law, much less given a fair trial, the principles and policies approved by the people at the election.
> It is a recognized truth that the necessary expense connected with a membership in the House of Representatives is frequently prohibitive to many able Members whose wise counsel our country can not well afford to lose. Many of the most able and efficient Members are continually withdrawing from the work for the sole reason that they can not afford, for pecuniary reasons, to remain. It has become quite generally understood that a poor man can not afford to retain a seat in the House of Representatives. The greatest item of expense connected with the retention of a membership in the House is the cost connected with the nominating primaries and conventions, the campaigns, and the elections. The extension of the term of office to four years would materially lessen such expenses and would thereby enable men in moderate circumstances to live within the limits of the salary.
>
> The national election at which Members of the House of Representatives are chosen always has a depressing and unhealthy effect upon all branches of business, and there is always during such campaigns and elections an uncertainty in business affairs throughout the country and a hesitancy on the part of business men in the extension and enlargement of their investments. This condition can but result in detriment and injury to the prosperity of the entire country. * * * An uncertainty in the future policy of our Government, to be determined at an election, always retards our commercial advancement and affects the prosperity of our entire people.
> The possibility also that a policy once adopted may be cast aside within two years is likewise detrimental to our advancement. The proposed change would tend to give stability and take away the uncertainty now existing.
>
> There is a sentiment throughout the entire country that we have too many elections. The people are not free from the unpleasantness of one political controversy before they are thrust into another. They have become tired of and disgusted with the continual political quarrel and strife.
>
> The people are tired of this continuous drama, and as a result are inclined to give no attention to the primaries and the conventions—the very foundation of our political system—the forum wherein the country's interests can best be guarded and protected.
> With an election every two years the political grafter who thrives on partisan strife and on the nervous uncertainty controlling candidates for office is able to live from one election to another by the boodle secured at his unholy business. The adoption of the proposed amendment would render it less possible for this creature to ply his trade. * * *
>
> It is apparent to all of us that we can not perform our duty in justice to ourselves or to our people and have an election every two years as well as we could if the term was four years. It is perfectly proper, as we all know, that men who come here should be able to give their entire attention to public affairs; but as a practical truth, if they stay here, it is necessary for them to pay more or less attention—generally more—to political matters that go on at home in which they have a personal interest, while their attention ought to be attracted and given to public questions in which the entire people have an interest. Now, I know, Mr. Speaker, it was said the framers of the Constitution intended that this House should be close to the people. I agree with that sentiment and the adoption of this amendment will not take away that idea from the Constitution.
> Men of great ability and honor often refuse to become candidates for the House of Representatives because they know that before they become familiar with the duties of their office they will be compelled to again enter the arena of political controversy to retain it. It was no doubt the idea of the framers of our Constitution that Members of the House of Representatives should be close to the people and be required to frequently give an account of their stewardship. A change in the term of office from two to four years would be no violation of this principle, but would better enable Members to devote their energies and abilities to the actual service of the country and their constituents. Four years is not so long that there could be any valid objection from that source. The history of many of our States where the terms of office have been lengthened from two years to four years gives ample proof for this assertion. It is likewise true that the experience of States where some of the officials are elected for a term of four years and some for a term of but two years shows that the officials serving a 4-year term are more efficient than officials serving a 2-year term.
> There is nothing sacred that I know of in the 2-year term. If a short term makes Congress better, then we ought to change the tenure to one year. Then we would enjoy the distinction of going out of office before we got in, or at least within a month or two of it.

The reasoning advanced by the above distinguished Member of the House in 1906 is applicable to-day, and in view of the fact that that Member of the House is at this time a Member of the Senate and is the author of the resolution which the House is now considering makes the reading of his views at that time most interesting.

Mr. BLANTON. Is the gentleman from Michigan a follower of Senator NORRIS?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Iowa has expired.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Chairman, I can not agree to this amendment. I have always objected to pulling up the sheet anchors that have guided the destinies of this Republic for over 150 years. I have always said that this provision limiting the terms of Representatives in Congress to two years was one of the wisest provisions, from my viewpoint, that the fathers of this Republic engrafted into the fundamental laws of the land.

You gentlemen who have discovered something wrong with the Constitution should not forget that George Washington presided over the Constitutional Convention, which was composed of a great aggregation of the greatest minds the world has ever seen. They put this provision in the Constitution in order that the people might have a check upon a bad administration. See how well it worked last year. [Laughter.] You Democrats who came in last year ought to be thankful for this provision of the Constitution, instead of trying to destroy it. [Laughter.]

The distinguished gentleman from Alabama tells you what the people think. No man in this House has a higher regard for the gentleman than I have, personal and otherwise. His district touches mine for more than a hundred miles. We represent the same kind of people. They speak the same language. They have approached me on the subject, and I have said I would go out of Congress before I would ever vote to change the term of Representative in Congress from two years to four years. Why? I said that was put there as a safeguard for the American people. It was placed there by men like Washington, Madison, Franklin, and Hamilton, the great founders of this Republic. It has served a most salutary purpose, and as long as I am here I will never vote for such an amendment, and if it is adopted I will fight its confirmation by the legislatures of the various States. If it goes in, I expect to vote against the entire resolution. [Applause.] But that is not all. The American people do not have the same view of this measure that some Members have who are running for reelection, and when this comes before the legislatures and these wise men, these old ex-judges of the supreme court, these old Republican and these old Democratic judges and lawyers and statesmen, who are not running for Congress, will pick up their pens and show the people of this Republic that this 2-year provision is necessary and that it was placed here as a salutary safeguard for the American people, in order to protect them against misgovernment. You will find such sentiment against this amendment that the whole thing will got down to defeat.

Not only that, but we Democrats are opposed to centralization of power. This is one of the greatest moves toward centralizing power in the White House that I have ever seen. We have heard all this cry of "Stand by the President." We will hear it this fall. You Republicans will hear it, and if we had a Democrat in the White House we would hear it. It will be the main issue in every campaign. Individualism in the House will disappear, but the only question will be: "Are you standing by the administration?" This is the greatest step, in my opinion, toward centralization of power in the White House and the perpetuation of the party in power, that has been proposed since I have been a Member of the House.

I had made up my mind to vote for the Norris amendment, although I did it reluctantly, but if this amendment is adopted I shall not only oppose it here but I will oppose it out of this House. I will do everything I can to prevent the legislature of my State and the legislatures of other States from tearing up the sheet anchor of safety that was planted by men who knew more about government than any man in either end of this Capitol to-day. I shall do everything in my power to preserve this Constitution and pass it on to our posterity, that this grand old Republic may go down to the future with strength in her loins, hope in her soul, and a Miriam song of triumph on her lips. [Applause.]

Mr. JEFFERS. Mr. Chairman, may I say to the committee that this resolution as it is now before us, having had stricken out all after the enacting clause of the Senate resolution and inserting in lieu thereof the House resolution, the language of the Rutherford bill is the result of long and careful study on the part of the House committee which reported the bill. We believe we are presenting a good resolution here now, one which probably will be presented to the States for ratification, just as we are submitting it to you here now for your consideration.

Now, this proposition of injecting this half-baked, ill-considered amendment for a 4-year term for Members of Congress is very unwise, in my judgment. Let me call attention seriously to this thought. It would take long and careful study to work out a plan whereby it would be assured, if such an amendment should be adopted, that the beginning of the 4-year term of Members of Congress would coincide with the beginning of the 4-year term of the President. If it were not so, it would be a chaotic condition. We have been over this whole proposed constitutional amendment time after time in the committee. We have been trying to think it through, in order that we might bring something in here to you which could be depended upon as being workable. If we now add any of these amendments we may make the whole scheme impractical, unacceptable, and unworkable, and I trust this amendment will not be injected into the resolution. I hope it will be voted down.

Mr. LEAVITT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JEFFERS. Surely, I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. LEAVITT. With regard to one of the fears of the chairman of the committee permit me to state that if this proposed amendment should be adopted I intend to offer an amendment to section 5, following the word "year," to insert these words, "in which presidential electors are chosen next," so that section 5 would read:

Sections 1 and 2 shall take effect on the 30th day of November of the year in which presidential electors are chosen next following the year in which this article is ratified.

There would be no doubt then as to when it would go into effect.

Mr. JEFFERS. With all due respect to my friend the gentleman from Montana, it is an impracticable proposition to take chances in proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, to jump up here and try to decide in five minutes on such an amendment.

If we should submit a constitutional amendment to the Nation which is found by students of the subject to be unworkable and unwise, it will, of course, subject this Congress to criticism the Nation over.

Mr. SWING. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JEFFERS. Yes.

Mr. SWING. I fully concur with what the gentleman says about the phrasing of legislation which is ultimately to become a part of the permament Constitution of the United States. If an amendment such as the one now under consideration is to be adopted, language should be worked out which would stagger the terms of the Members so that half would be elected every two years, thus preserving the original intention of getting the sense of the country every two years.

That proposal would have to be worked out very carefully. It takes time to work out those things, and so important will be the result of whatever is done in connection with a constitutional amendment that we should not at 3 o'clock in the afternoon be taking up entirely new amendments which have not been carefully considered by the committee.

Mr. JEFFERS. The remarks of the gentleman from California amply illustrate some of the questions which might arise. He has suggested that if this should be put into this resolution the terms should be staggered, so that one-half of the Congress would be elected in one even-numbered year and the other half in the other even-numbered year.

I want to say that if you will look at sections 3 and 4 of this resolution, read them carefully, and consider them for a moment you will realize how difficult it has been to write the provisions which are now in this resolution. Therefore, this thing which we are talking about now should receive some real study before we take the serious step of recommending it to the States as a proposed amendment to the Constitution of the United States.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, I am sure it is not necessary before opposing an amendment to indulge in expressions of confidence in and love for the sponsors of it. Members have a right to offer amendments. I never did subscribe to any such custom. Let us get right down to the proposition. I believe I express the viewpoint of every Member of the House that the office of Representative in Congress is a mission and not a job. If anyone thinks it is a job, let him vote for this amendment. It is convenient; it is comfortable for the Member; it insures a 4-year tenure of office without the necessity of going back to the constituency every other year. But, regardless of the personal convenience and regardless of any merit there may be in it, the term of two years for Representative in the House and six years in the Senate, with a 4-year term for the President, is typically an American institution. The 2-year term—just half of that of the President—gives the people a check and control on the Executive. Remove that and we will have absolute control of government in the Executive and his policies for a period of four years without the opportunity on the part of the people to protest by electing a House in opposition. We all know that little by little powers have been taken away from the people. We must not remove this necessary and wise provision which is so necessary as a safeguard in a democracy.

Imagine a President with a large majority in both Houses adopting policies contrary to the wishes or interest of the people. Why, under our present constitutional safeguard, as soon as the people realize that a check is necessary they soon have the opportunity to protect themselves by electing an adverse House which has the power of thwarting any Executive. With a 4-year term this power is taken entirely from the people.

Mr. LEWIS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Yes.

Mr. LEWIS. Very many parliaments have been established in the world and constitutions written since ours was written.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Yes.

Mr. LEWIS. Perhaps the gentleman will explain why only Mexico and Colombia have the 2-year precedent adopted here.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. In reply to that I will refer the distinguished scholar, the gentleman from Maryland, to the constitutions that have been patterned after ours but which have failed to retain this safeguard, and I will ask him if we have not outlived every other republic that has been established? [Applause.]

Others which have been patterned after ours have sought to overcome the inconvenience of submitting to the people every other year. It may be convenient to politicians, but it is contrary to the best interest of the country. A number of republics in South America have even ignored the constitutional provisions with reference to their elections. That is what happens when people lose direct contact with their own governmental affairs.

I say, my friends, that right now when the tendency is away from self-government and away from representative government toward dictatorship is the time we should be on guard more than ever. There is no telling how any presidential election may go, sweeping with it control of both Houses of Congress, and then a policy established directly in opposition to the viewpoint of the majority of the American people. Their only salvation is every other year to send a House of Representatives to protest against any such policy. [Applause.]

Mr. CELLER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Yes.

Mr. CELLER. Is it not true that in England and France, as well as in practically every European country, the tenure of office of the representatives in the lower houses of parliament is coterminous with the administration and that elections are far more frequent than once in every two years.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Yes. And more than that, whenever the administration loses control of the House, it automatically goes out of office and the decision is left with the people.

Let us be frank about all this. There is opposition to the "lame-duck" amendment, and every Member opposing it has the right to do so if he really has convictions against it. I believe the idea of coming here 13 months after election is as antiquated as the stagecoach and muddy roads which made that provision necessary 150 years ago.

But as to the method of approach, if you are opposed to the "lame-duck" amendment, stand up like men on the roll call and vote against; but do not load it down with impossible, un-American provisions. [Applause.]

Mr. DICKINSON. Mr. Chairman, I am intensely interested in the passage by this House of Representatives of the pending resolution, Senate Joint Resolution 14, which passed the Senate on January 6, 1932, which reads as follows:

That the following amendment to the Constitution be, and hereby is, proposed to the States, to become valid as a part of said Constitution when ratified by the legislatures of the several States as provided in the Constitution:

ARTICLE —

SECTION 1. The terms of the President and Vice President shall end at noon on the 24th day of January, and the terms of Senators and Representatives at noon on the 4th day of January, of the years in which such terms would have ended if this article had not been ratified; and the terms of their successors shall then begin.

SEC. 2. The Congress shall assemble at least once in every year, and such meeting shall begin at noon on the 4th day of January, unless they shall by law appoint a different day.

SEC. 3. If the President elect dies, then the Vice President elect shall become President. If a President is not chosen before the time fixed for the beginning of his term, or if the President elect fails to qualify, then the Vice President elect shall act as President until a President has qualified; and the Congress may by law provide for the case where neither a President elect nor a Vice President elect has qualified, declaring who shall than act as President, or the manner in which a qualified person shall be selected, and such person shall act accordingly until a President or Vice President has qualified.

SEC. 4. The Congress may by law provide for the case of the death of any of the persons from whom the House of Representatives may choose a President whenever the right of choice devolves upon them, and for the case of the death of any of the persons from whom the Senate may choose a Vice President whenever the right of choice devolves upon them.

SEC. 5. Sections 1 and 2 shall take effect on the 30th day of November of the year following the year in which this article is ratified.

Passed the Senate January 6, 1932.

In 1923, when a Member of this House, I introduced House Joint Resolution 65, similar to sections 1 and 2 now pending here, and which, as introduced by me, read as follows:

Joint resolution proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States fixing the commencement of the terms of Members of Congress

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled (two-thirds of each House concurring therein), That the following amendment to the Constitution be, and hereby is, proposed to the States, to become valid as a part of the Constitution when ratified by the legislatures of the several States as provided by the Constitution:

SECTION 1. That the terms of Senators and Representatives shall commence on the first Monday in January following their election.

SEC. 2. That the Congress shall assemble at least once in every year, and such meeting shall be on the first Monday in January, unless they shall by law appoint another day.

SEC. 3. That the terms of Senators and Representatives who may be in office at the time of the adoption of this amendment shall end at noon of the first Monday in January of the year in which such terms would otherwise have ended on the 4th of March.

Time and again has effort been made, particularly in the other body, to pass this proposed amendment to the Constitution. Great credit has been properly given by the country to that distinguished progressive, Senator NORRIS, of Nebraska, for the passage of this joint resolution, time and again to pass in the Senate, only to fail of passage in the House of Representatives.

It has been suggested that Senator NORRIS, the author of the original resolution, while a Member of the House, favored a 4-year term for Members of Congress. Whatever may have been the then judgment of the author of this proposed amendment to the Constitution, as to whether it should be four years or two years, it comes here after full consideration by the Senate in the shape in which it is now before the House, without changing it from two years to four years.

If you should amend it by placing a 4-year provision in the resolution, you would not know whether it would run coterminous with the election of the President. I am not entirely out of accord with the thought that a Congress elected at the same time that the President is elected would better enable legislation to be enacted into law in response to the declared will of the people, but the amendment as now proposed does not seek to bring this about, as well stated by a Member on the other side of the aisle, for section 5 provides that sections 1 and 2 shall take effect on the 30th day of November of the year in which this article is ratified, which might result in election of Representatives in Congress in off years, rather than in presidential years. I am opposed to this proposed amendment, seeking to substitute 4-year terms for the present terms of two years for Members of Congress, for I earnestly desire the passage of this joint resolution now, in its present shape, and not its defeat at this session.

The proposed amendment has been thoroughly discussed throughout the country, and the sentiment of the country largely favors its adoption. The change from two years to four years has not been discussed before the people of the United States. This matter has been delayed long enough, and it ought not to be defeated or delayed by amendments that would tend to defeat it and prevent it from being submitted by this Congress.

Mr. Chairman, if the proposed amendment should go to the people or the legislatures of 48 States for ratification, with a provision lengthening the terms of Members of Congress from two to four years, it might meet defeat by those whose Representatives we are. The people are justly jealous of surrendering power, and in my judgment they might be reluctant to extend the terms of their Representatives from two to four years, and thus we would invite the defeat of this much-desired amendment to the Federal Constitution by the required three-fourths of the legislatures of the 48 States. I thought the amendment was germane as offered by the distinguished member of the Rules Committee, Mr. BANKHEAD, of Alabama, but on the question as to whether it should be adopted as an amendment to this resolution I am utterly opposed to it for the reasons I have stated. I want a change in the Constitution so that Representatives in Congress shall not only discuss before their constituents in their several districts every two years legislation that has been pending in Congress or desired by the people, but I am anxious that Congress shall meet in January after the November election to carry into effect the will of the people to whom they are responsible, and not wait 13 months as now after their election before they are sworn in and take their seats in Congress, leaving to defeated Members the enactment or defeat of legislation pending in Congress in the short session of Congress as now exists.

Let us pass this joint resolution seeking to amend the Constitution, and thus get rid of what we understand is called by the people and in the press the "lame-duck" Congress. Let us allow this proposed amendment to go to the country now without further delay, and let us not by adopting amendments kill it or delay its passage, or jeopardize its ratification by the legislatures of the several States. Amend by changing two to four years, and you will either fail to secure ratification by three-fourths of the legislatures of the 48 States or long delay this amendment of the Constitution, and thus continue for many years your "lame-duck" Congresses, to be controlled as heretofore by those selfish interests that seek to dominate legislation.

I hope the amendment, proposed in good faith, I am sure, by my friend, Mr. BANKHEAD, of Alabama, will be defeated. [Applause.]

Mr. GIFFORD. Mr. Chairman, as a member of the committee, I wish to appear on the record as against this amendment. While it has not been directly before the committee of late, we are familiar with its purpose, and the committee has always refused to add something to the amendment which seemed to be of a selfish purpose.

We are trying to correct a principle of government. It has always appeared to us that this amendment would kill the resolution, as has been so ably expressed by the last speaker.

Mr. Chairman, if this amendment should prevail, I would plead with the proponent of the legislation to frame such a section to be added to the resolution that will allow it to be voted on separately when it is proposed for ratification by the people. I think that they should do this. May I remind the House that when the first 10 amendments were presented to the people, they were presented in such a way that each amendment was voted on separately.

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Chairman, I should not have asked for recognition at this time except for the parliamentary situation with respect to this legislation.

As I understand it, we are proposing to strike out all after the resolving clause of the Senate resolution and to substitute the resolution of the House committee. This means that when the Committee of the Whole rises, it will have an opportunity to vote upon the substitute as perfected here in the Committee of the Whole in toto or en bloc, but not upon the different amendments separately that are put upon the substitute here in the Committee of the Whole.

For this reason, Mr. Chairman, I want to put myself squarely on record with regard to this particular amendment. I do not want to be a party to putting amendments upon this co-called "lame-duck" resolution which, in my judgment, are going to prevent its ratification by three-fourths of the legislatures of the States, and I think if you couple the amendment sponsored by the gentleman from Alabama and by the gentleman from Maryland with the amendment as reported by the committee, it means the sure defeat of the whole proposition.

We know; we have seen what effect it has had on the membership of the House of Representatives here. Men have taken the floor who have said that they are in favor of the resolution as reported by the committee, but they say if this amendment is put onto it they will oppose the whole resolution—not only here in the House of Representatives but in their State and other States as well.

For myself I want to go on record and have the RECORD show that I will not be a party to loading up this resolution with amendments which mean its sure defeat. [Applause.]

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. STAFFORD. I wish to inquire, for the information of the House, whether the amendment to the rule that was moved by the gentleman from North Carolina, providing that the substitute should be considered as an original bill, does not put it on the same status that any amendment that might be adopted by the committee would be subject to a separate vote when the committee rises and reports the resolution back to the House?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks that is a question which should be decided in the House.

Mr. STAFFORD. There are many Members present here who were absent when the amendment was offered by the gentleman from North Carolina providing that the substitute reported by the committee should be considered as an original bill. I think under those circumstances any amendment adopted as a substitute would be open to a separate vote in the House.

Mr. MAPES. I think the precedents are so firmly established that there is no question about the parliamentary situation. I have discussed the matter with those who have some parliamentary responsibility in handling legislation here in the House, and I think there is no question about the parliamentary procedure so far as that is concerned.

Mr. KELLER was recognized.

Mr. JEFFERS. Will the gentleman from Illinois yield to me?

Mr. KELLER. I will.

Mr. JEFFERS. Mr. Chairman, I have no desire to take gentlemen off the floor, but I believe everybody here wants to get through with this bill this afternoon, and I wonder if we can not arrive at some decision as to debate on this amendment and the section.

Mr. DOWELL. I want a few minutes.

Mr. MICHENER. We only had three hours of general debate on this constitutional amendment. This is Saturday afternoon, and we are not going to take up anything else, and it seems to me that the membership should be allowed to express themselves on this most important matter.

Mr. JEFFERS. I have no desire to cut anybody off.

Mr. RAMSEYER. What limitation of time did the gentleman have in mind?

Mr. JEFFERS. About 15 minutes.

Mr. ROMJUE. Will the gentleman from Illinois yield to me?

Mr. KELLER. I will yield.

Mr. ROMJUE. I want to ask the gentleman for his opinion on this question. If this amendment is placed here in the resolution, when it comes to be ratified in the future, and is ratified so that it will be effective in a presidential election, so that Congress and the President are elected at the same time always, if the gentleman does not believe that it will have a tendency to deter and abrogate the checking power of the minority party and be detrimental and injurious to legislation and the public welfare; a great safeguard to our Government rests in the fact that we have two strong political parties, so that whichever is in power the minority party for the time being is usually strong enough to serve as a check and balance on the party in power?

Mr. KELLER. I think you are right.

Mr. Chairman, I helped to bring this discussion up because I wanted to hear it. I am glad I have, for to me it has made one thing very clear, and that is that this amendment should not prevail. I doubt whether any other amendment should prevail any more than this one, for the simple reason stated by my colleague, Judge DICKINSON, in which he said that the people of this country know all about this amendment, and are ready to ratify it. But if we put anything on it in addition, they are not ready to ratify it, and they will not ratify the resolution if amended. If this amendment is attached to this resolution, it will be defeated, in my judgment. We ought not to jeopardize the resolution. I thank you.

Mr. DOWELL. Mr. Chairman, I believe the decision of the Chair in holding this amendment not in order was correct, but the Committee of the Whole has overruled the decision of the Chair and has held by vote that it is in order. This subject matter is entirely different from the proposition that is before the Congress. There has never been any proposition of this kind submitted with reference to this constitutional amendment until it was presented here to-day. In my opinion, by the adoption of this amendment, you are going to inject an entirely different proposition than the one we have been called upon to pass on.

Mr. MICHENER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DOWELL. Yes.

Mr. MICHENER. Did I understand the gentleman to say that the matter before this committee has never received consideration before?

Mr. DOWELL. Not on this resolution.

Mr. MICHENER. Certainly not on this resolution that we have up to-day.

Mr. DOWELL. And not before the House.

Mr. MICHENER. Was the gentleman in the room when I called attention to a resolution introduced in the Senate by Senator NORRIS?

Mr. DOWELL. But it has not been considered.

Mr. MICHENER. Oh, it was debated extensively.

Mr. DOWELL. It has not been here for consideration. I believe the House should not adopt this amendment. I am heartily opposed to placing on this resolution such a proposition, and probably destroy the original resolution. I am opposed to this amendment, and hope the amendment will not be adopted.

Mr. PATTERSON. Mr. Chairman, I am opposed to this amendment for two reasons. First, I think it will defeat this proposed constitutional amendment, and, second, it is a fundamental change in the principle of our Government. I want to outline to you in a few brief words what this will do. Had this amendment been in effect at the time of the election in 1928, we would still have a Speaker elected by the majority party who went in at that time, and that party would be overwhelmingly in the majority in the House of Representatives now, and this biennial appeal, which resulted in a Democratic House, could not have come about. I think this change has been and is valuable. I believe we should have this check on an administration. It is fundamental in that respect, and all throughout the history of our Government this check has justified itself. It would take more and more power away from the people of the country, as has been attempted of late in various ways. I do not see how Members believing in the fundamental principles of democracy and progressivism can advocate tying this amendment on here. I very much fear that such an amendment will be a blow to democracy and check the voice of the people in their choice of the Members of the House of Representatives, that great body that enacts revenue legislation. We would have to change the organization of the House from two years to four years, and there could be no change of expression in the country even though sentiment changed as it does. You can point to two or three times in the past where a change of administration of the lower House of Congress was a splendid thing. Go back to 1910, when the Republican Party was in power.

In 1911 the Democratic Party organized the Congress, and there were some splendid reforms for the good of representative government. That would not have occurred if the 4-year term had been in existence, and there is no one who could tell what would have happened two years later if those reforms had not been brought about.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PATTERSON. Yes.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Does not the gentleman think it is unfair for the advocates of extending the length of term of Members of the House to attempt to write it into the Constitution on a "lame-duck" amendment?

Mr. PATTERSON. I am opposed to the amendment but would not want to put it that way, for I have all respect in the world for my colleagues who differ with me on this and all other questions. I am like the gentleman from Mississippi, I would give up my term as a Member of the House before I would vote to extend that term, and as the gentleman from New York said, this is not a job, this is a mission where we are called upon to serve our people and speak their voice, and for me I shall not support any such legislation.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Does not the gentleman think that an amendment to the Constitution extending the term of office of Members of the House should stand upon its own bottom?

Mr. PATTERSON. Something as far reaching as this is should have long and careful consideration and should not be tacked on to a measure like this. I hope that the Members of this Congress who believe in democracy will defeat this amendment first, because it will prevent the ratification of this proposed constitutional amendment, and second, it will change the fundamental principles of our Government, which to me is the bright and shining star in the constellation of all governments. And in closing permit me to point with a feeling of pride to the framers of this great Constitution as well as that great patriot whose birthday we celebrated on yesterday. As for me, I will stand here and battle as best I can for a government "of the people, by the people, and for the people," and fight rather to increase the power and check of the masses on our Government, believing thereby I can come nearer perpetuating the ideals of Americanism.

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Chairman, we have only one proposition here, and that is whether or not we will pass this "lame-duck" resolution. I am just a little bit astonished that some of my splendid colleagues should wish to ride in on a "lame duck" with an amendment which, in my judgment, although I give them all credit for sincerity, can mean nothing less than the defeat of the original Norris resolution as amended by the House committee. I am in favor of the "lame-duck" resolution. Therefore I am opposed to any and all amendments to the report brought in by the committee. I am not a worshipper of committees. I follow no committee unless I think it is right. Do the American people desire the destruction of the "lame-duck" proposition, or do they want to continue to let it flutter along to the injury of the country as it has for these many years? I think they want to see this "lame duck" brushed off the earth for good. I have not time to argue at length nor eloquently, even if I had the ability, in behalf of this "lame-duck" amendment, but I take it for granted that every one of my colleagues occupies pretty much the position of myself in his own community. If he saw here a man of magnificent character, well posted along certain lines, and over there another one well posted along other lines, and he believed in the man, in his integrity, and when he did not have time to weigh a proposition himself, he would naturally follow the advice of that man. I am in that attitude right now. If I were blind and could not read, if I were deaf and could not hear, still if only by the sense of touch it could be made known to me that this resolution was prepared by the hand of that magnificent American patriot, GEORGE NORRIS, I would say it must be a good thing anyway, and I would vote for it.

Mr. GLOVER. Mr. Chairman, I am very much opposed to this amendment and to the manner in which it is brought here. We are dealing to-day, in the resolution that is before us, with a matter that has been before the country, and the voice of the people has been heard upon it. Here is another proposition brought in and put on like a tail to a kite on this resolution. That is a very important matter and that is a fundamental part of our law now. I think if it is desired to submit that question to the people, there should be two separate submissions. Submit each on its own merits, and let the people vote on it.

Much has been said to-day about "lame ducks." I want to say to you that if you tack this amendment on and send it back to the people and thwart the will of the people, you will make more "lame ducks" than you have heard of in a long time. [Applause.]

I say to you that when you tamper with the will of the people, you are tampering with that which is sacred. The gentleman from Alabama who offered this amendment is my personal friend, and I regard him highly as a legislator. The gentleman said that his people had come to him and wanted to know why he had to come back every two years. Oh, that man was his friend. But the other fellow, who might not have been so well satisfied with what had been accomplished, has to wait for four years before he can express his will. The man who is for you is glad to meet you and greet you every two years and indorse your acts. Let me say to you that one of the ways the country keeps posted with reference to national affairs is by the policy that we have now in our Constitution, when we come back home and talk to our people face to face and tell them what we have done and what we have tried to do, and let them give us our marching orders for another term. [Applause.] When you have the privilege of going back home in a short time, you will have the privilege of telling them all about the good things you did for them—about the two billion dollar bill which you have given to the great wealth of the country, and you have given no bread to the poor. You boys would like to tell them about that. They want to hear you, face to face, and they will talk out. They will ask some questions why it was you did so and so, and they have a right to do that. That is where you hear the voice of the people.

Of course, you would like to have four years without a contest for reelection, but in my experience in public service there is no greater delight than going back to my people and letting them judge my acts in any representative body in which I have ever served, and have them let me know whether I am correctly representing them in their views. [Applause.] That is the only way you can feel the pulse of your district. Go back to them and get your indorsement and get your marching orders and stay two years.

Let us not change this. There is not a man here who is opposed to this resolution who will not vote for this amendment. I know when you go back to the legislatures of the various States of the Union, you will not get the constitutional number required to indorse this proposition. If you want a correction as is provided in the resolution, let us adopt it without amendment. If you want to kill it, vote for this amendment and vote for all the other amendments which are proposed.

I am going to vote for this resolution as it stands. I have some convictions with reference to some things in it that I would like to have changed; but I know that if we amend it, it will be the death knell of the bill, so I am going to support it just as it is written. [Applause.]

Mr. DOUGLASS of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, it has been some time since I have had the physical courage to address this House, but I hope to-day I have the political courage to oppose this amendment.

I shall have to fight as hard as any man in this House for renomination to this honorable body. I have had to do it for the last four elections. You should all be willing to do likewise to acquire the great dignity of this position. If there be any sound and logical argument for the adoption of this amendment, it has not been stated upon this floor to-day. Whatever seemed to be the motives that guided the judgment of some Members, as I have been able to find them since this debate began to-day, those motives seem to come—I dislike to make the statement—but they seem to come from private interest rather than public good and necessity.

Mr. Chairman, under our beneficent Constitution, particularly that part of it which requires that election to this House shall be biennial, we have achieved the reputation of being the greatest deliberative body in the world, and it behooves you not to rush to judgment now, but calmly and deliberately consider just what we are doing. Are you willing, upon the specious reasons and private reasons that have been advanced—one class publicly advanced and the other secretly here to-day—to make this great change in our form of government? Are you going to lessen the dignity of this great body by changing it from a body that represents the popular will every two years to one that shall become a body which will be but a part of an elected administration? [Applause.] That is what you will do. You will change yourselves from Representatives of the people to puppets of the administration, whatever it may be, Democratic or Republican.

Have you consulted your constituents in this regard? Have you asked them how you should vote? Have they had notice of the calling up of this amendment to the Norris resolution?

My time is brief, and I would I had more, but I can not ask it. But one thought that has been running through my mind as I have sat here listening to-day is this: What is going to be the effect back home in your districts if you vote for and adopt this amendment? What will your people and the people of the country at large think of you as Members of Congress? In these days of depression, when 8,000,000 people are clamoring for work and public employment, when at least 3,000,000 people are clamoring for a bite to eat and a place of shelter for their shivering bones, are you going to go before the country and say, as you have said up to this time, "You shall not have a million dollars or even a thousand dollars for public works; you shall not have anything that can be considered in the nature of a dole to feed your hungry stomachs, but we Congressmen, we $10,000 a year Congressmen, elected for two years with our salaries coming regularly every month, are going to elect ourselves to two more years in the form of a 4-year term"? I dare you to do that and go back to your constituents. [Applause.]

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. Mr. Chairman, there are a great many reasons of convenience which justify this amendment; but after the very best thought I have been able to give it for many years, I am profoundly convinced that the 2-year term is a fundamental part of democratic government. [Applause.] There are a great many things that are worse, my friends, than the inconvenience of frequent elections.

Now, gentlemen, of course it is inconvenient for Congressmen to go before the people every two years. A great many men are in districts where they have to go twice, once in the primaries and once in the general election. That is all true; but I am one of those who believes that the perpetuation of this Republic depends upon the separation of the executive, legislative, and judicial branches of this Government. [Applause.] When you adopt this 4-year provision, when you elect your President along with the Members of your House, the tendency is to absolutely subordinate the legislative branch of the Government to the executive branch.

Now, do not do this. I beg of you, my friends, do not do this. We have in this country now too much centralization of all kinds. We have too much pressure on us now from the executive branch of the Government. Let us remember, my friends, the words of the man whose birthday we celebrated yesterday and do what we can to see "that government of the people, by the people, and for the people shall not perish from the earth." [Applause.]

Mr. JEFFERS. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate on this section and all amendments thereto close in 10 minutes.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Chairman, I hesitate to take up any more time of the committee any further than to point out to the members something which was said upon this subject many, many years ago when the Constitution was adopted. It was Hamilton, in the Federalist, fifty-third volume, who said:

> Where annual elections end, then tyranny begins.

Hamilton, conservative as he was, wanted the elections of the Members to the lower House to be annual. Why was it made every two years? That was a compromise. Hamilton bowed to the argument that there were great distances to travel. The Representatives had to use the stagecoach and the horse in those days, and that was one of the reasons why the election was held every two years for representation in this House. Surely if distance then was used as an argument to increase the term from one year to two years, the shortening of distances through the use of our present rail transportation and airplane transportation should not be used as the reason for increasing the tenure for two years more.

Hamilton again said, in volume 52 of the Federalist, February 8, 1788:

> Biennial elections will be as useful to the affairs of the public as * * * they will be safe to the liberty of the people.

Blackstone, in his Commentaries, volume 1, page 189, if you will go back as far as that for authority, speaking of the tenure of the more representative branches of government, had this to say:

> A legislative assembly which is sure to be separated again would be bound to feel its own interests as well as its duties bound up with those of the community at large.

Story, the great authority on the Constitution, in the fifth edition of his book on the Constitution, section 588, page 588, says:

> Frequent elections are unquestionably the soundest, if not the sole, policy by which dependence upon the people, sympathy with the people, and responsibility to the people that elected them can be effectually secured from the people's representatives.

In conclusion, if any more need be said upon the subject to persuade you to vote down this amendment, let me again call your attention to other remarks by the great Hamilton. He said (sec. 587, Story on the Constitution):

> It may, therefore, be safely laid down as a fundamental axiom of republican governments that there must be a dependence on and responsibility to the people on the part of the representative which shall constantly exert an influence upon his acts and opinions and produce a sympathy between him and his constituents.

He thus said that this nearness of people to Congress could only be brought about by most frequent elections.

Why is it that our Constitution provides that bills to tax shall originate in the lower House? This was put there because the framers of our Constitution knew that this House, of all parts of our Government, was nearest the people. The people can reach out to the membership here and quickly and effectively register their will, under penalty of defeat at the polls. They want this body, which has power to originate taxes, amenable to their immediate will. [Applause.]

Vote for this proposal and you serve the best interests of yourselves only.

I therefore ask you to vote down this amendment.

Mr. SHANNON. Mr. Chairman, there are many Members of this body who in good faith are for the Norris amendment. They believe in it. They have been taught to believe in it. It has been before the country for many, many years. It has reached this House before, but by strange ways has met defeat.

I regret to say that the so-called liberalizing of the rules of this House does not make them liberal enough so that we can get a roll call on this particular amendment to the Norris amendment. I dislike to believe that I shall have to tell my people when I go back home that our rules are so poorly "liberalized" that those of us who believe in the Norris amendment have had to vote for it with an obnoxious amendment, or else vote the whole thing down.

I say this is unfair. It is not fair to the people. If the proposal of the gentleman from Alabama is offered in good faith, the gentleman should come in here and offer it as a separate amendment.

As the gentleman from Massachusetts said a moment ago, when the first 10 amendments to the Constitution were offered they were voted upon separately, and those 10 amendments came from the followers of Thomas Jefferson. I say to you gentlemen who believe in the teachings of Hamilton, get those on our side of the House who are really Hamiltonians and form a new coalition; make it a Hamiltonian group; but let those of us who believe in giving the people their own government have a chance, so that even though we may be in the minority we will be heard as Jeffersonians and not as Hamiltonians.

Again I say to you that I am here as one of the protesting Members of this body. My predecessor was elected by a substantial majority. I come from the center of the great agricultural belt of the West. I am in the very heart of it. There was but one vote of my predecessor's that was considered in the late election, and that was his vote on the tariff bill. After the people considered it, and gave thought to the vote of this gentleman, they elected poor me by 46,600. [Applause.]

When you take away this off-year election, you leave no method by which the people may pass on the existing administration, and you do them an injustice.

Jefferson said he would not give a fig for a people who did not have the spirit of revolt in their blood lest those at Washington take away from them their Government. The vote of the people at the last election was a vote of protest; in fact, it was a revolt against this administration; and now you come in and say by this proposed amendment to the Norris amendment that this right of approval or disapproval shall not be left with the people.

Let me remind you that this protest has been used frequently. It was used against that great soldier, U. S. Grant, and it did not hurt the Grant administration a particle. It made it a better administration. It was used against that great character, Grover Cleveland, and it improved his administration. Then it was used against that fine soldier and great lawyer, Benjamin Harrison, and it made his administration a better one. Then when the mighty Wilson went out and said, "Send me back a Congress of my own political party," the American people stood up and protested, and I want to say to you that it made the Wilson administration better, by serving notice upon him that this is a people's government and not merely a President's government. [Applause.]

In conclusion, no matter what may be the motives of the gentleman who proposes this amendment to the Norris amendment, the public will accept it as being intended for no purpose other than to kill the amendment offered by the Senator from Nebraska. Let me urge you to meet it face to face. Do not be cowards. Come forward and vote yes or no stating, "We are for the Norris amendment, or we are against the Norris amendment." [Applause.]

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHANNON. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. The gentleman has correctly stated the parliamentary situation. If the committee adopts the Bankhead amendment, then the gentleman will have to vote for it if he votes for the Norris amendment.

Mr. SHANNON. Then I will be put in the position of being compelled to vote against something I have been for for years, for I shall not vote in favor of the amendment with the Bankhead amendment on it.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Alabama.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. BANKHEAD) there were 65 ayes and 112 noes.

So the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 2. The Congress shall assemble at least once in every year, and such meeting shall begin at noon on the 4th day of January, unless they shall by law appoint a different day.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment: Strike out all of section 2, and insert in lieu thereof the following:

SEC. 2. The Congress shall assemble at least once in every year, and in each odd number of years such meeting shall be on the 4th day of January, unless they shall by law establish a different day. In each odd number of years such meeting shall be on the 4th day of January, and the session shall not continue after noon on the 4th day of June.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. Chairman, I have no desire to discuss this amendment, having said all I care to say about it on yesterday. But I want to call attention to the fact that I have followed verbatim the Longworth amendment, with the exception that the date of adjournment is extended until the 4th day of June, rather than the 4th day of May, as contained in the amendment offered last year.

I again call the attention of the committee to the fact that this is the amendment that was largely supported on both sides of the House and was made a part of this resolution last February.

Mr. JEFFERS. Mr. Chairman, I have no intent or desire to delay the proceedings, because we want to go right along. I have hesitated to take the floor at this juncture, but let me just suggest one or two things. Why is it necessary to limit this date? It will become a part of the Constitution, and at some future time in the history of the Nation, when the business of the country has changed, and we can not foresee to what extent it may be necessary for them to have more time for the sessions of Congress, we are, in effect, saying now that they will not have sense enough to judge for themselves what time is necessary. They will think we were very presumptuous here in 1932 to insert in the Constitution a hard and fast date for them to be bound by at a time, say, 20 or 30 or 40 or 50 years hence. We should leave them free then to decide for themselves.

Now, they contend that the President could call a special session of Congress immediately. But suppose the President would not do that? The Congress would be without the power to work its own will. Let us leave it to our successors to determine when the session of Congress in which they serve shall end. Surely we can trust them to do that.

I agree with the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. RAMSEYER] when he says that this body should act independently on its own initiative and not be controlled by any other influence. I agree to that, and in the Committee on Election of President, Vice President, and Representatives in Congress, as well as in this Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, my own attitude is based on what I think and believe to be right, and not upon what somebody else dictates. I say that this should not be a part of the bill, and that is my own judgment, after giving much consideration to it as a member of the committee and as a conferee.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JEFFERS. Surely; I yield.

Mr. BLANTON. My friend does not believe that after the present Congress has passed the proper relief bills and the proper appropriation bills it is going to remain here any longer.

Mr. JEFFERS. No; Congress, when it finishes its work, will go home. Congress is not going to sit here an undue length of time.

Mr. MAY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JEFFERS. Yes; certainly.

Mr. MAY. I have heard a lot said this evening about the wisdom of the framers of the Federal Constitution. If they placed a limit of three months on the second session of Congress, is not this a rather liberal allowance to extend it for two additional months?

Mr. JEFFERS. Now, then, the gentleman knows that that is not a fair question. The reason there is a limit on the session of Congress to which he refers is because on the 4th day of March that Congress goes out of existence automatically. The forefathers did not arbitrarily place that limit. The Congress goes out of existence at that time by operation of the Constitution.

Mr. PATTERSON. And this would be arbitrary limitation.

Mr. JEFFERS. Why, of course.

Mr. BURTNESS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JEFFERS. Yes.

Mr. BURTNESS. As a practical proposition, was not the adoption of this amendment or a similar one a year ago what prevented the two Houses from getting together in conference then and having the resolution go to the people?

Mr. JEFFERS. To a certain extent that is true. That conference happened in the closing days of the last Congress. The conference was tied up; it was in the jam at the end of the session, with Members of the House and of the Senate hurrying back and forth from the conference room to the floor of the Senate and the floor of the House. While that was somewhat responsible, it was not entirely so.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I regard this as an exceedingly important amendment. Let us get down to the only question involved. The question as to how long the Congress should sit is not involved. Let us get that straight. There is but one question involved, and that is, Shall the Houses of Congress be trusted to determine the length of time during which they shall undertake to transact the public business without having to resort to Executive consent? Is that clear? Is there a man on the floor of this House who will controvert that question? I yield if there is one; I yield in my own time. There is not a man on the floor of this House who can controvert that statement of fact. That is the question. In a Government of three coordinate branches, with Members of the House of Representatives sent here by a sovereign people, will you in this hour confess to your people that you have not the sense or the courage to determine how long you are to sit here to transact the public business?

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Yes.

Mr. RANKIN. As a matter of fact, under certain recent rulings, would not this cut the session 10 days shorter, because the President can cut down the law by vetoing a bill within the last 10 days?

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. I shall not leave the major proposition. That is, Shall the Members of the House confess to the country that they believe that they have not the sense or the patriotism or the courage to determine how long they ought to sit here to take care of the public business? I say to my friend who offers this amendment, and for whom I have the highest respect, I am not unwilling to join you in asking the President of the United States to sit as the arbitrator of that question.

Mr. GLOVER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. I regret I can not yield. I shall not yield to any man on that question, and I shall not yield to any man who ever sat in the White House or who ever will sit there to be the supreme judge above the judgment of my colleagues in this body chosen by the sovereign citizenship of this country on a question so vital as the continuity of its effort until the work is done. We ought to vote this amendment down out of a sense of responsibility and a willingness to meet it.

Mr. PATTERSON. And this would be an arbitrary setting of a seven months' period for which we draw salary when we could not transact business.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. I shall not leave the major question and that is, Will we Members of the representative branch of this Government yield to anybody in another branch of the Government the right to determine for us how long we shall sit here in the transaction of the public business? That is the question and the only question. Every other thing fades into insignificance. It is no wonder that people make fun of the Members of the House. Why should they not make fun of you if you agree to a proposition like this and thereby confess that you have not either the sense to know or the courage to fix how long you will sit here to transact the public business. Of course they ought to make fun of you on every vaudeville stage in the United States if you do this sort of thing. The people will respect the Congress when it respects itself.

Mr. GIFFORD. Mr. Chairman, this is a separate proposition, one entirely by itself. We have lived under this limitation ever since the Congress was organized. There has been a limitation when we have to adjourn. This has nothing to do with the "lame-duck" matter, for which so many have said that they want to vote. The matter has been so long under consideration that we are anxious to legislate thereon. This limitation has been considered before, and last year it was the vote of this body, by a vote of 229 to 148, that it should be continued in some form. The amendment accepted at that time has been liberalized to-day to June 4, giving five long months, even, in the second term. That is long enough, surely. We have now, in fact, only two and a half months. But if, by chance, the House shall reverse itself from the opinion expressed last year, and the gentleman from Texas still feels that he does not want to be under the control of another branch of the Congress, I give notice that I shall immediately offer this same amendment, changing the Longworth amendment but little, to provide that in each even year the sessions shall not continue after noon of the 4th day of June unless the Congress shall by vote appoint a different date for adjournment, leaving it entirely within the hands of Congress by joint action as to whether we shall sit here or not, and thus deliver us from the possibility of another body deliberately keeping us here by their interminable debates.

Mr. LOZIER. Certainly my friend from Massachusetts does not contend that the language used in his amendment would enable the two Houses of Congress to determine the length of their sessions, without the President in the usual manner approves the action of Congress. There are many places in the Constitution which authorize Congress by law to do this or that, but this means that Congress shall act in the customary way, and its action must have the approval of the President. The gentleman's amendment in substance provides that Congress may by law determine the length of its sessions, but the courts would construe that to mean that the action of Congress would have to be approved by the President like any other law before it would be effective. The language in the gentleman's amendment does not and can not enlarge the power of the two Houses of Congress to such an extent as to enable them to extend their sessions beyond the time limit mentioned in the amendment unless the congressional action meets with Executive approval. The language that Congress may by law provide for this or that means that Congress in those cases would function just like it functions in the enactment of tariff bills, appropriation bills, and other legislation, namely, with the approval of the President. The proposed amendment is not sufficiently broad to take from the President the power to veto the action of the Congress.

Mr. RANKIN. I wonder if the gentleman would offer an amendment along that line to take from the President the power to veto bills for 10 days prior to the end of that session.

Mr. GIFFORD. I wish it could be done.

Mr. RANKIN. It can be done by an amendment to the Constitution.

Mr. MICHENER. Does the gentleman want this on this particular resolution? I would not discuss it, if it is not germane to this resolution.

Mr. RANKIN. If you want to amend the Constitution at all along that line——

Mr. GIFFORD. I do not yield to outside discussion like that.

Mr. STAFFORD. To meet the objection raised by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. LOZIER] the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Massachusetts would require the approval of the President. I suggest that might be overcome in this way: Instead of having it done by law, have it done by concurrent action by both Houses of Congress, in the form of a concurrent resolution. Would the gentleman be willing to change his amendment to embody that idea?

Mr. GIFFORD. I should be glad to have it changed to meet that objection, but we often overturn a veto of the President of the United States, and it would be effective in such a case.

Mr. STAFFORD. But the Congress should determine for itself whether it should continue in session.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts has expired.

Mr. BARTON. Mr. Chairman, being a new Member, my opinions on this subject were formed outside of this body. Therefore, I may view the question from an angle somewhat different from many of you.

It has been suggested that this resolution would change the Constitution, a thing not to be thought of for light or transient reasons. It is urged that the present arrangement originated in the wisdom of the fathers and should, therefore, remain unmolested.

Bear in mind that one of the purposes of this amendment is to change the date on which the President, Vice President, Senators, and Representatives in Congress enter upon the discharge of their official duties. I have been much interested in the history by which this was fixed. Curious as it may seem this date is not mentioned in the Constitution. In fact when that instrument was written it was not known whether it would be ratified and, if ratified, when operation under it would begin. The length of the terms of these officers, however, was definitely fixed, so we have but to determine the beginning and the end is made certain.

On September 13, 1788, the Continental Congress, by resolution, found that the requisite number of States had ratified and declared the "first Wednesday in March next" as "the time for commencing proceedings under the new Constitution." The first Wednesday in March, 1789, was the fourth day. This date has therefore been recognized and followed for more than a hundred and forty years, and I think will be followed until changed by constitutional methods.

On another phase of this resolution—changing the date for Congress to convene—it is urged that a constitutional amendment is too big a weapon to wield in order to achieve the small results contemplated, "that the game is not worth the candle"; and that the substantial results can be attained by a simple statute. To this I do not subscribe.

It is true under the Constitution that Congress may fix any date for its convening, but there are practical obstacles well-nigh insurmountable. Suppose we fix March 4, as has been done in the past. If there should be much work, the session would run far into the summer. I am informed that summer weather at this place is inconsistent with good work. You can not repeal the weather, neither can you change it by an act of Congress.

Again, suppose we fix the convening date on January 4, as contemplated by this resolution, without changing the official terms. This would make the long session a month shorter, and, if the short session should last more than two months, would present the remarkable and awkward situation of changing membership in the middle of the session.

The welfare of the country demands the deliberate and unimpassioned judgment of its officers. This is especially true in the legislative branch, where such broad discretions are exercised. I agree with the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. MONTAGUE] that partisanship "is the most insidious disease any of us possesses, and those who possess it most think they possess it least." I also agree that every effort should be made to remove our deliberations from the sordid atmosphere of partisan politics.

A "cooling time" is urged—meaning a time after an election for its heat and passion to subside. "'Tis a consummation devoutly to be wished." I would also warn you of a "warming time," meaning a time before an election when the heat and passion and hope of the approaching contest are being generated and agitated. How shall we dodge the rock and miss the whirlpool?

Let us examine our present situation from this angle. This session convened 13 months after our last election—an ample time for the cooling process. It began only 11 months before our next election, and will probably end 5 months before that contest is determined. We have dodged the rock but the whirlpool lies before us. Free as this Congress has been from partisanship, the shadow of the coming campaign now lies across our pathway, the atmosphere is charged with politics. The "warming time" is on and obstructs and retards our deliberations and perhaps influences them.

From this angle the short session is no better. It convenes only one month after the election. Those reelected return with all the heat and passion of the campaign. Recommissioned they feel not only authorized but directed to write into law what they advocated on the stump. While there are outstanding exceptions the attitude of those defeated is even worse. Some do live in an atmosphere of legislative calm without hope of reward or fear of defeat, but too many entertain a grouch. I have never known a man to be convinced of error in his position by being defeated at the polls. Too often in such a mind his party is personified and loyalty to it is deified. Free from all restraint he goes any length to further the interest of his party. We do not now dodge the rock nor avoid the whirlpool in the short session.

Again, under our party system, elections frequently turn upon principles rather than men. The defeat of a candidate is often the rejection by the electorate of the laws he advocates. It is an anomaly, to say the least, for a man to hold a commission by which he can write into law principles after they have been rejected and repudiated by his constituents. In this debate we have heard described stirring scenes when a party, knowing the end of its power was at hand, made strenuous efforts to pass laws already rejected by the people and the party already elected and approved for succession equally resourceful and anxious for delay. Such, in my opinion, is not for the best interests of our people.

Again, I see no reason for a long session and a short session. A better arrangement would be to equalize the work so the sessions would be of about equal length.

For these reasons I am for the resolution.

Mr. JEFFERS. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate on this amendment close in 10 minutes.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Chairman, this resolution has been kicked about in Congress now for several years. Some Members say it is not of first importance. That may be conceded; but Congress has magnified its importance by its failure to pass it, and every time it refuses to pass it, it makes it more important in the eyes of the people.

I am one of those who have consistently supported the resolution every time it has been before Congress, ever since I have been a Member of this body, and I have as consistently opposed any amendment to it which would fix the time for adjournment of the second session of Congress. It seems to me that that may well be left to the discretion of future Congresses, to be exercised in the light of the exigencies as they may exist at the particular time. In my judgment, it is not a proper provision to put into the Constitution. It would put Congress in a straight jacket such as it ought not to be put into. I am not afraid to trust Congress to fix its own time for adjournment. I do not believe that anyone need be afraid that the sessions of Congress will be unduly prolonged without such a provision. The personal interests and inclinations of Members, if nothing else, will take care of that. Congress is more likely to adjourn when there is business to be performed, when there is legislation that ought to be considered and passed, than it is to stay in session when there is no business before it and when it ought to adjourn. Who ever knew it to continue in session under such conditions? The urge is all the other way.

I wish to say further that I do not entertain the notion that Congress hurts the legitimate business of the country. Business is sometimes inclined to criticize Congress, but it is the first to rush to Congress whenever it gets into trouble. We had an illustration of this this last year. Congress adjourned on the 4th day of March. Some business men said "That is a good thing; it will give us an opportunity to go along about our business without being molested by Congress, and give the country an opportunity to get back into a prosperous condition." We all know what happened. The same critics, before the summer was over, were anxious to have Congress get together again, and as soon as the first Monday in December came and Congress was in session, they were here asking Congress to pass legislation to help them out, and very properly so.

I hold in my hand a copy of an address entitled, "Amending the Constitution," which I was privileged to hear over the radio last Sunday afternoon, delivered by the former distinguished leader of the Democratic Party in this body and now Associate Justice of the United States Court of Customs and Patent Appeals, Hon. Finis J. Garrett. As everybody here would expect, it was a highly interesting and able address. Of course, he said nothing about this proposed amendment in that address, but he did discuss it in the Seventieth Congress, and I have before me a copy of his remarks at that time.

I want to call attention to what he thought of this particular amendment. He said:

> Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that the House committee has taken a proposal—

And let me say that the House committee at that time reported the resolution with a provision in it fixing the day of adjournment. In the last Congress the committee left out that provision, as it has in this Congress, but with the prestige of the Speaker behind the amendment in the last Congress, as you all know, it was put into the resolution after it was reported by the committee.

This is what the distinguished leader of the Democratic Party in the House at that time said in the Seventieth Congress about the amendment now proposed:

> Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that the House committee has taken a proposal which was relatively not of overwhelming importance, but which was sufficient to merit amendment of the Constitution, and has attached to it a principle which will do infinitely more harm if adopted than all the good that will be wrought by the original proposal. [Applause.]
>
> While I stated in the early part of the debate on this matter my willingness and desire to support that part of this proposal which is a question of mechanics—and I use the word again because I can think of none better—I was unwilling then, and nothing has been stated in the debate which makes me willing now, to vote to lay this limitation upon the power of Congress itself to determine as to the termination of its sessions. [Applause.] And with that as an integral part of this amendment, I can not vote to submit it for ratification.
> Some gentlemen have said, "Submit it and let it go to conference." Upon legislative propositions I might be willing to do that; but upon an amendment to the organic law I am unwilling to risk my vote to the determination of conferees. The principle of this matter has been asserted by many and it is not necessary for me to go into it. I could bring to your attention many illustrations of possibilities and probably many illustrations of probabilities that would render this undesirable as a matter of principle. Take, for example, the question of impeachment. Congress is called upon to exercise this great function, and has frequently done it. With a limitation such as proposed, fixed by the Constitution itself, Congress might be helpless even in the exigency of an impeachment of the Executive himself. After May 4 of the second year the President is the only power that can bring the Congress back together under this proposition. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, we all know that there are two evils which are inescapable at the end of a short session of Congress, when we are automatically compelled to adjourn on the 4th of March, namely, the filibuster and the rushing through of ill-considered legislation. The same evils would exist at the end of any session which was obliged to adjourn automatically on a given day. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. SWING. Mr. Chairman, in the constitutional amendment before the House, as in every constitutional amendment, we are considering the granting of power by the people to the Federal Government. We have here provided for the meeting of Congress. The precise amendment now under consideration proposes the limitation that Congress shall not be permitted to act or function in its constitutional capacity except by and with the consent of one man. No one knows who that one man is going to be, what his temperament is going to be, or what his mental or physical condition is going to be at the time some important June 4 arrives.

The Constitution, being fundamental law, ought to provide for all contingencies which may happen, and not merely provide for most of the contingencies that may arise.

Who can see into the future and know what the situation will be confronting the country on some June 4 when, by the provisions of the Constitution, if this amendment is adopted, a succeeding Congress will be compelled to adjourn? We might be in the midst of a national or international crisis, yet the Congress would cease to function unless the President of the United States was in a mood to call a special session.

It seems to me this amendment is primarily prompted by the question of the comfort and convenience of the Members. We are accustomed to adjourn about June 4. We realize the weather is warm at that time. We therefore hope that in the future, while we remain in Congress, we will be permitted to adjourn at about that time. Prompted by this desire for comfort and convenience, we are asked to write into the fundamental law of the land that the Congress must adjourn June 4 and go home.

We are willing to give to future Congresses the power and the authority to vote on such important measures as aid to commerce; we are willing to permit future Congresses to incur debts, provide for the coinage of money, and pass laws relative to our financial and national banking system. We are even willing to give future Congresses the power to declare war; yet under this amendment we propose to withhold from them the inconsequential power of passing a motion to adjourn when the business of the House and the Congress has been completed. If we can trust their judgment on these other momentous questions, why can we not trust them to make a right decision on a motion to adjourn? [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from North Carolina.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. WARREN) there were—ayes 54, noes 98.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. GIFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. GIFFORD: Strike out all of section 2 and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"The Congress shall assemble at least once a year. Such meeting shall be on the 4th day of January. In each even-numbered year the session shall not continue after noon on the 4th day of June, unless the Congress shall by law or by concurrent action of both Houses of Congress appoint different dates for meeting or adjournment."

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order against the amendment. It seems to me it is the same amendment that was just voted upon.

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman state his point of order?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. If I can not reserve it, I make the point of order that in substance it is the same amendment which was just voted upon by the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. No. It is a different amendment. The Chair overrules the point of order.

Mr. GIFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I want to call briefly the attention of the committee to the fact that it seems to me this amendment ought to meet the objection of the gentleman from Texas. Certainly, it removes the time of adjournment from the power of the President. It certainly answers the objection of the gentleman from California, and I might call the attention of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. JEFFERS] to the fact that the gentleman advocated this, I think, last year.

I regret very much that the other amendment was lost; but, seemingly, this amendment ought to answer practically all the objections made against the other amendment.

I regret that this limitation should be regarded as new matter. I repeat, that we have had this limitation on the second session ever since the Government was organized, but we treat it here to-day as if it were a new thing, as if we were talking about our own convenience. Under this amendment we are extending the time from two and a half months to five months and, Mr. Chairman, I sincerely hope the amendment will be adopted.

Mr. JEFFERS. Mr. Chairman, I do not desire to extend this debate now because I know the members of the committee want to vote, and I am perfectly willing for them to vote, but since it has been stated that this is a proposition which I sponsored last year, I must state that in trying to arrive at something to modify the hard-and-fast date last year I did suggest something to this effect. But it was then suggested as a modification of the other and more rigid amendment. I was not for this amendment except as a matter of compromise between the two, and that goes for what happened in conference, also. I think this proposed amendment simply "muddies the water" and we do not know just what the effect of it might be.

The language of the committee resolution has been studied carefully by the committee. I think this pending amendment should be voted down.

Mr. SANDLIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JEFFERS. Certainly; I yield to my friend.

Mr. SANDLIN. Would not the amendment, if adopted, simply mean that if a majority of the Congress wanted to adjourn they could not adjourn unless we passed a law, and then the President could veto it and it would take a two-thirds vote to override the veto?

Mr. KVALE. If the gentleman will yield, it is the exact reverse of that. It puts it in a negative way so that unless Congress takes positive action it literally ties the hands of Members for the last six months of their term.

Mr. SANDLIN. I understand that, but we would have to get the consent of the President also.

Mr. JEFFERS. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate on this amendment do now close.

The motion was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. GIFFORD) there were—ayes 58, noes 88.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. SUMNERS of Texas: Page 3, strike out all after "unless" in line 14 down through line 15 and insert in lieu thereof the following: "by concurrent action of both Houses of Congress a different day is appointed."

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I just want a minute of indulgence on the part of the committee to explain the proposed amendment. This amendment is intended to bring this section in line with what seems to be the will of the committee with reference to the general question under consideration, and may I ask the Clerk to read section 2 as it would appear if amended?

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 2. The Congress shall assemble at least once in every year, and such meeting shall begin at noon on the 4th day of January, unless by concurrent action of both Houses of Congress a different day is appointed.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Yes.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. This comes rather suddenly. The outgoing Congress could then, by concurrent resolution, fix the date for the convening of the new Congress, and if it were an antagonistic Congress, instead of advancing the date it could retard the date up to almost the very last day.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. May I say to my friend from New York that the resolution would have to be agreed to by the House and the Senate, and if we assume that the House and the Senate will do an unconscionable thing with regard to the time when their successors are to meet—well, we are just in a pretty bad fix.

What I want to do is to place in the House and in the Senate the power to control their own business without having to go to the other end of the Avenue to get the consent of anybody.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. I yield.

Mr. STAFFORD. Does the gentleman mean that the power should be vested in the Congress simply to control the convening date of that Congress, or also of subsequent Congresses? The gentleman will recall that Andrew Jackson vetoed a resolution to appoint a different date for the convening of a subsequent Congress because the President held that it infringed his prerogative to convene Congress in extraordinary session. The phraseology of the amendment submitted by the gentleman would seem to give power to fix the convening date of subsequent Congresses.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I realize that it is hardly fair to the House, hardly fair at this stage of the proceedings, to offer an amendment of this character, and I ask unanimous consent to withdraw it, hoping that it may appear in conference. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the amendment will be withdrawn.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 5. Sections 1 and 2 shall take effect on the 30th day of November of the year following the year in which this article is ratified.

Mr. RAMSEYER. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 6. This article shall be inoperative unless it shall have been ratified as an amendment to the Constitution by the legislatures of three-fourths of the States within seven years from the date of the submission hereof to the States by the Congress; and the act of ratification shall be by legislatures, the entire membership of at least one branch of which shall have been elected subsequent to such date of submission.

Mr. RAMSEYER. Mr. Chairman, this amendment I have just offered does not go to the substance of the pending resolution. That part of the resolution which proposes to change or amend the fundamental law is found in sections 1 to 4, inclusive. My amendment has to do with procedure of ratification.

This is the same section I have referred to as having been offered to this resolution when first considered in 1928 in this House. Mr. Garrett, the then minority leader, was the author of this amendment. It was adopted after a debate of some length by a vote of 187 to 23.

Last year this same proposal was a part of this resolution as reported by the committee.

I am offering the same amendment that was offered by Mr. Garrett in 1928 and was adopted by a vote of 187 to 23. It is word for word the same as section 6 in the resolution last year. Then there was no opposition to it.

Now, my amendment has two clauses. The first is that the proposed article to the Constitution shall be inoperative, unless ratified within seven years. There is a similar provision in the eighteenth amendment, the prohibition amendment, and the Supreme Court in a decision said in regard to the validity of the 7-year provision that:

Whether a definite period for ratification shall be fixed so that all may know what it is and speculation on what is a reasonable time may be avoided, is, in our opinion, a matter of detail which Congress may determine as an incident of its power to designate the mode of ratification.

In another portion of this opinion the court said:

That all amendments must have the sanction of the people of the United States, the original fountain of power, acting through representative assemblies.

Now, the first clause of the amendment is that the proposed article shall be inoperative unless ratified within seven years after submission. The second clause, which I regard more important from the standpoint of orderly procedure, is that the ratification shall be by legislatures, the entire membership of at least one branch of which shall be elected after the date of submission. This is to give the people, the original fountain of power, an opportunity to get acquainted with and to pass judgment on the congressional proposal before their agents in the State legislatures are intrusted or empowered to act.

Now, the 7-year limitation is reasonable. It has the sanction of the Supreme Court. It affords ample time for the States to act.

Furthermore, every one of the 19 amendments to the Constitution was ratified within four years after its submission. No one can insist with reason that seven years is not long enough.

Now, the second clause, which delays action on the part of the State legislatures, is to insure the people an opportunity to instruct the members of at least one branch of the legislature how to vote on the proposed amendment submitted by the Congress. I do not know how anyone who understands the Constitution and the fundamentals of the Constitution can possibly object to this clause requiring a delay in action on the part of the legislatures. The Constitution of the United States is the people's law. What is in the Constitution is law. Only the people can change that law. An act passed by a Congress is a law by the agents of the people, and is valid only if that law does not conflict with the fundamental law as found in the Constitution. A resolution to amend the Constitution proposes to change the people's law. The first step is to submit it by a two-thirds vote of each House of Congress. It goes to the States for action by assemblages representative of the people. We could refer it to State conventions. If we referred it to State conventions, the people would have to elect delegates to the conventions, and thereby we would get the proposition before the people. Now there are State legislatures in session none of the members of which were elected to pass judgment on the pending resolution. They should not be allowed to pass on this proposal until the people themselves have had an opportunity to consider it. I am sure everyone who understands the Constitution as the people's law will agree with me on this.

On February 14, 1931, I discussed Constitution amending at some length, and presented in detail the action of the States on each of the amendments which have become a part of the Constitution since the twelfth amendment. Some of these amendments were ratified by the States before there was an election to elect members of the State legislatures. In other words, the act of ratification was not by the people but by agents of the people. Agents not selected for that purpose. Briefly, I call your attention to a few facts.

The thirteenth amendment was submitted on February 1, 1865. In that same year 27 States ratified that amendment. In all these States the legislatures acted without instructions from the people. The people were not consulted.

The fourteenth amendment was submitted on the 16th of June, 1866, and that same year six States ratified it. The next year 16 States ratified it. When the fourteenth amendment was up in the House of Representatives Thaddeus Stevens, who was the leader on the Republican side, wanted the amendment passed before the sun went down in order that it might be acted upon by the State legislatures, 22 of which were in session at that time. The spirit of Thad Stevens still lives. Some Members here are just as impatient as Stevens was and are just as disinclined to give the people a chance to pass on constitutional amendments.

The fifteenth amendment was submitted on February 27, 1869; that same year 20 States ratified it. It is needless to call attention to the fact that in these States the people had no opportunity to express themselves. The sixteenth amendment is the income tax amendment, and that was not so hastily ratified. Only a few States ratified it before new legislatures were elected.

The seventeenth amendment was submitted May 6, 1912. Three States ratified it in that same year. The eighteenth amendment was submitted on December 17, 1917. Fifteen States ratified it in the year 1918 by legislatures the membership of which was elected before the amendment was submitted.

The nineteenth amendment, the woman's suffrage amendment, was submitted June 5, 1919, and twenty-two States ratified it the same year. No new legislatures had been elected. The purpose of my amendment is, first, to prevent ratification after the proposal has gone out of the people's mind, and, second, to delay the act of ratification until the people have had an opportunity to study what the Congress has submitted to them and to instruct the members of their legislatures accordingly.

Mr. PARSONS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAMSEYER. Yes.

Mr. PARSONS. Why make it seven years? Why not make it four years?

Mr. RAMSEYER. That is a matter of judgment. There is nothing sacred about the figure 7.

Mr. PARSONS. They will go on from year to year and forget about this matter, and some of these years we will wake up to find that we have an amendment to the Constitution.

Mr. RAMSEYER. Seven years has been accepted as a reasonable time.

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAMSEYER. Yes.

Mr. MAPES. I recently read the discussion of the gentleman on this subject in the Seventieth Congress. It was very interesting and informative. Is not the importance of the gentleman's amendment discounted a good deal by the fact, as the gentleman pointed out in his discussion in the Seventieth Congress, that all of the 19 amendments that have been adopted were adopted by the States within four years; and the further statement of the gentleman after reviewing the decisions of the Supreme Court, that in his judgment the court would hold that the adoption of an amendment long after it was submitted would be invalid and not binding?

Mr. RAMSEYER. The 7-year limitation, just as the Supreme Court has said and as I read to the gentleman a moment ago, is reasonable and should go in here so that people may know the definite period they have for ratification. On second clause, of course, there is absolutely nothing that can be said against a stay of ratification until the people shall have had an opportunity to elect and instruct the membership of at least one branch of the legislature.

Mr. KVALE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAMSEYER. I yield.

Mr. KVALE. On that point, would the gentleman not admit that would be largely ineffective, due to the fact that it would be impossible to divorce all local issues that would enter into the election of legislators in a State?

Mr. RAMSEYER. There might be such issues, but I contend that we should at least give the people an opportunity to instruct their legislators for or against the proposed amendment.

Mr. KVALE. But there could be no clear-cut decision of this one proposition.

Mr. RAMSEYER. There might be. They should have an opportunity, at least, and no one who is in favor of orderly procedure in connection with Constitution amending and who has any respect whatever for the will of the people, can say anything against deferring action until the people have had a chance to express themselves as proposed in the second clause of my amendment.

Mr. PERKINS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAMSEYER. I yield.

Mr. PERKINS. Does the gentleman know that in one case a State legislature attempted to adopt a constitutional amendment which had been passed by Congress 84 years prior?

Mr. RAMSEYER. Well, that is true.

Mr. HARLAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAMSEYER. I yield.

Mr. HARLAN. Does the gentleman think that placing this amendment on the proposed constitutional amendment which, in effect, means the fifth article of the Constitution, the general article allowing for amendments, will give power to select a legislature which is to do the amending?

Mr. RAMSEYER. Oh, my amendment simply affects this particular proposed article to the Constitution and does not in the least change Article V of the Constitution. It directs that the act of ratification of this proposed article shall be delayed until after one general election. Its purpose is to bring Constitution amending near to the people, where it should be and to give the people an opportunity to consider the proposed amendment at least during one election campaign.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. LOZIER. Mr. Chairman, I always listen with much interest and profit to the arguments advanced by the gentleman from Iowa, a profound lawyer, a very industrious, able, and useful legislator, but I can not see the necessity for his amendment. Now, let us look this situation squarely in the face. The practical effect of his amendment is to make it more difficult for this constitutional amendment to be ratified. Why? Because it specifically provides that it must be ratified within seven years. It erects a barrier at the end of seven years, and nullifies everything that has been done unless 36 States ratify the amendment within that period. If 35 States ratify the amendment in the 7-year period and the thirty-sixth State acts one day after the seven years, all action by the 36 States would be futile, and Congress would have to begin over again and resubmit the amendment or forego the much-needed reform. The amendment erects a barrier or barb-wire entanglement at the end of seven years that can not be surmounted. I believe more than 36 States will ratify the amendment within less than seven years, but why create a situation that may ultimately defeat ratification, if some of the States should be tardy in acting on the amendment. Thirteen States can prevent the ratification of this amendment.

Suppose 35 States ratify it; the end of the seven years is approaching. If those who oppose this amendment can induce any one of the 13 States to withhold favorable action until the 7-year period has passed, then everything that has been done by Congress and 35 States will amount to nothing. Consequently everything will have been done in vain.

Thirty-five State may ratify this amendment within a year. It is not inconceivable that none of the remaining 13 States may act within the 7-year period. But if the thirty-sixth State does not ratify the amendment in seven years, the entire movement ends in failure, though the thirty-sixth State might act soon after the expiration of the 7-year period. Why should a limitation be placed on the time within which this amendment shall be ratified? Why should we adopt this provision which makes it more difficult to secure ratification and might ultimately defeat the amendment?

Mr. RAMSEYER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LOZIER. I yield.

Mr. RAMSEYER. The gentleman knows there is no amendment that has been made to the Constitution which has taken longer than four years to ratify. The Supreme Court says seven years is a reasonable limit, so that everybody will know that there is an end to it some time. If this goes into effect, it will be ratified within the next three years.

Mr. LOZIER. I hope the gentleman is right—and he usually is right. But the gentleman does not mean to say that the Supreme Court has held that seven years, and only seven years, is a reasonable time limit in which an amendment may be ratified.

Mr. RAMSEYER. Oh, no.

Mr. LOZIER. If the gentleman's amendment prescribed a time limit of 8 years, 10 years, or 5 years, no doubt the Supreme Court would hold it reasonable.

Mr. RAMSEYER. I do not know.

Mr. JEFFERS. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate on this amendment do now close.

The motion was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. RAMSEYER) there were—ayes 42, noes 65.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. JEFFERS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out all after the enacting clause in Senate Joint Resolution 14 and insert in lieu thereof the committee amendment which we have had under consideration.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the committee amendment as a substitute for the Senate joint resolution.

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. Under the rule the committee rises.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. BULWINKLE, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration Senate Joint Resolution 14, proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States fixing the commencement of the terms of President and Vice President and Members of Congress, and fixing the time of the assembling of Congress, and had directed him to report the same back with an amendment, with the recommendation that the amendment be agreed to and that the joint resolution as amended do pass.

The SPEAKER. Under the rule the previous question is ordered, and under the agreement made by the House the vote on the resolution will be taken next Tuesday.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, the vote will be taken immediately after the reading of the Journal and the disposition of matters on the Speaker's desk?

The SPEAKER. That is the Chair's understanding.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted to Mr. MOORE of Ohio (at the request of Mr. COOPER of Ohio), on account of sickness in family.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS—SENATE JOINT RESOLUTION 14

Mr. JEFFERS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members be permitted for five legislative days to extend their remarks on the resolution we have had under consideration to-day.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent that all Members be permitted for five legislative days to extend their own remarks on Senate Joint Resolution 14. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Mr. Speaker, while I shall, in all probability, vote for the so-called Norris resolution, or the substitute proposed by the House committee, I must confess that I am not convinced of the necessity of a constitutional amendment to accomplish the purpose aimed at.

There can be no question but that it is a glaring anomaly to have the Members of Congress wait in suspense for 13 months after their election before they begin to render service or perform their duties. They begin to draw their pay on the March 4th following their election and there is no reason in the world why they should not begin on that very day to earn it.

Surely the Constitution is not at fault. That superb instrument was drawn with admirable foresight and leaves the time of convening completely in the hands of Congress itself. It provides in article 1, section 4, subdivision 2, that Congress:

> Shall assemble at least once in every year, and such meeting shall be the first Monday in December, unless they shall appoint a different day.

"Unless they shall appoint a different day!" There is the authority. Why not make use of it if we are really serious about doing away with "lame-duck" sessions?

If each new Congress should meet on the March 4th following its election all complaints about "lame-duck" sessions would vanish. The new Members would have three months in which to prepare to take up their new duties and those not reelected would have the like period in which to resume their accustomed nonpolitical vocations.

The practice of having the new Congress begin its sessions on March 4th following its election has been tried before and in practical results it was successful. The only reason I can conjecture for the abandonment of the practice is that it deprived Washington society of its much-worshiped soirées, fashionable receptions, and dinner parties. If the demands of fashionable society in the Capital are deemed of sufficiently momentous importance, Congress, which has the power, can provide for a session to begin in December of the odd-numbered years, to last through the dance season, up to, say, February 15. This will give the débutantes a chance to dance with Members of Congress every second winter.

But whatever plausibility there may be in requiring Congress to meet earlier than March 4, there is absolutely no good reason to have the newly elected President and Vice President take office within two months after the election at which they are supposed to be chosen. The change is fraught with danger. If there should be a tie in the electoral college, throwing the choice into the House of Representatives, a prolonged contest there would have elements of much mischief.

In short, all of the practical, useful, and desirable features of this proposed amendment to the Constitution could be fully covered by a simple law requiring Senators and Congresmen to begin work when they begin to receive their pay and let the new President and Vice President begin their duties with them.

The thing that really needs amendment is the awkward and absurd twelfth amendment itself, with its undemocratic expedient of the electoral college, putting the States to the utterly unnecessary expense of going through the form of electing groups of figureheads, who have not a thing to say about the election, except to vote as a majority of the voters of their respective States direct them to vote.

The twelfth amendment should be repealed and the President and Vice President should be elected by direct vote of the people.

The hue and cry about "lame-duck" sessions is simply furnishing fodder to bolshevists.

Mr. ROMJUE. Mr. Speaker and Members of the House of Representatives, on to-morrow when we are to vote upon the above-named resolution submitting the matter involved in said resolution either for adoption or rejection by the people of the various States, it is presumed that the resolution will be passed by this body, thereby submitting the matter for the determination of the various States.

The resolution itself has been so thoroughly discussed I want to take time here mainly to call attention and to express my views as to two or three proposed amendments that have been offered to the resolution. First, I wish to consider the merits of the proposed Bankhead amendment, which is, in words, as follows:

> Provided, That the terms of the Representatives shall end as herein provided every fourth year after they are chosen by the people of the several States.

I do not think this amendment should be added to the resolution because I believe it would be an unwise thing to do. Those men who framed the Constitution of the United States were an exceedingly able body of men; wise in experience and of great deliberation, and much time was given to the writing of this, which we have so often referred to as an immortal document. While, of course, the Constitution being of human creation has never been proposed as perfection, but certainly whenever its terms are sought to be changed it should only be done under the greatest and most pressing need.

After much debate at the time of the framing of the Constitution, the terms of the United States Senators were made to extend for a period of six years, while the terms of Members of the House of Representatives were made to be for a period of two years. The reason for the short period of tenure given to the House of Representatives was a desire to have the Members of this body keep in close contact with the people throughout the various States so that each two years they could come back fresh from contact with the people and would be much more closely in contact with the needs and wishes of the people. The greatest danger to all human governments has rested in the fact that they have been inclined to get away from the masses of the people and have gradually grown centralized.

If this amendment to this resolution is adopted none can now tell, even if the matter is finally adopted, just when the last of the requisite number of States will add its approval, if at all, and if the term of a Representative is extended from two to four years there is an extreme likelihood of the terms of the Members of the House of Representatives beginning and ending with the terms of the President of the United States; and should the matter finally be ratified by the requisite number of the States, so that the terms of the President and the Members of the lower House of Congress would be coterminous, I think it would be an unfortunate situation for the people of this country.

I have had a great many people express to me the belief that a Congressman's term should be four instead of two years. Those who have so expressed themselves to me have usually been personal friends of mine, and have expressed the regret that we Representatives were required to make a campaign every two years. So far as the individual Representative is concerned, of course it would be much less expensive to him to have a 4-year term instead of two, but his contact with the people that he represents would very likely be not more than half as much under the 4-year term as it is at the present time, and personal contact with one's constituents enables a Member to much better reflect their views and wishes than one would be able to do if he did not have that frequent contact.

I think one of the most fortunate things in our system of government is the fact that we have two very strong and reasonably well-balanced political parties, so that whichever political party is in control of the Government, usually the other political party, whether it be Democratic or Republican, is of sufficient strength to hold quite a check upon the party in power, thus holding and reserving in the interest of the people a well-balanced political situation that is much more beneficial to the public interest than would be the case if one or the other political party were overwhelmingly in the majority in the control of the Government. Even as the matter stands to-day, there occasionally comes sweeping across the political horizon such a shift of power that one party becomes overwhelmingly in control. There is nothing more helpful to this Government than to have the off year, when elections shall occur between presidential elections, when there is much less expenditure in campaigns, and when people are not so much under the excitement of a hard-fought campaign, are privileged to cast their ballots more free from undue excitement and influence; and so I believe that if Congressmen were only elected when the President was elected that the influence of the presidential election would have a tendency to carry along too strongly perhaps the membership of the House, so I believe it will best preserve the balance of power, which has been so wisely provided for us by those who framed the Constitution, to have the election of Congressmen every two years instead of every four, and, for the reason given, this amendment to the resolution should be defeated.

Now we come to the proposed amendments offered to the resolution by Mr. WARREN and Mr. GIFFORD. These amendments are practically the same except that in each odd year, under the Warren amendment, Congress would be forced to adjourn on the 4th day of June, and the provision in the Gifford amendment would provide that in each even year Congress would adjourn automatically on the 4th day of June unless by joint resolution of the House and Senate further time for meeting would be extended. I know there are those who differ with me in their views as to the limitation being put upon every other session of Congress. Under the Constitution, as it is at the present time, each session of Congress begins early in December and the long session may extend until the corresponding time a year later, while the short session begins at the same time in December but automatically comes to an end on tne 4th of the following March. So we now have one long and one short term; the short term being a 3-month session. If either the Gifford or the Warren amendment were adopted to the resolution, the short term would then be five months long. I believe it is a wise policy for a provision to be maintained in the Constitution of the United States so that Congress will be compelled to adjourn alternately, at least every other session. There is one thing certain, if Congress is not in session it will not be spending the public's money; and in any emergency under the present Constitution, or in case this resolution is finally adopted by the required number of States, the President has power to call Congress into session, and I think one of the greatest dangers to our country is excessive taxation and excessive expenditures of the people's money.

In my State of Missouri there is a limitation put upon the legislative body of that State. Compensation runs at $5 a day for 70 days. After that, compensation is $1 a day and usually all necessary business is transacted within the 70-day period, so the limitation serves rather as an automatic closing of the legislature. Every State in the United States, so far as I know, has wisely found it necessary to place in the constitution limitations upon taxing power, and that is one of the wisest provisions that has ever been written into any constitution, because there comes a time in legislative bodies, just as there comes a time with private individuals, when there is a tendency to get on a spending spree; and while the private individual may have a right to squander his own private means and property, no public official should go unbridled and have unlimited power with the restraint to extravagantly spend the public funds. In practically all well-organized municipalities throughout the United States a limit has been provided so that officials in power and authority can not levy taxes beyond a certain limit, and wise is such provision when written into the organization of such municipalities by the State and municipal laws. The truth is we should be very slow in changing the fundamentals of our Constitution in any respect. If the next generation goes as rapidly as the present and past ones have gone in this respect, 50 years from now we will see little left of the fundamental principles of our Government.

I am, and have always been, a great admirer of "Old Hickory" Jackson, and he and Thomas Jefferson, I think, have been the two greatest Presidents the country has ever had. This Government came into existence and soon after assumed the payment of the colonial debts, and our country has never been out of debt from that day since except during the administration of Andrew Jackson. During his administration the United States Government was entirely free from public debt. I doubt if the American people will ever see that condition exist again, and I so heartily approve the presidential conduct of Andrew Jackson that I am ready to believe that he never made to exceed one official mistake in his life. If there is to be a single mistake chalked up against Andrew Jackson it is that when he walked out and found the committee in dispute as to where the United States Treasury Building ought to be located. Being vexed at their differences of opinion, he struck his old hickory cane down in the sod and said, "Thar is where the Treasury Building should be, and thar is where it will be." It so happens that he put his cane down between the White House and the Capitol, so that when the President of the United States looks over to Congress, the first thing that greets his eye is the Public Treasury; and when Congress looks down Pennsylvania Avenue toward the White House, the eyes of that body function immediately upon the Treasury Building, and there is where the money is, and so a ready invitation to spend is offered.

It might have been better had Jackson struck his cane in the sod in some out-of-the-way and obscure place so Congress and the President could not have so readily had before their eyes the United States Treasury. For these reasons I believe that it would be a wise policy that at least every other year Congress should be compelled by a law or by the Constitution to automatically adjourn. It is at least equally and I think more important, that the representatives of the people shall return to their homes occasionally and meet with their constituency and find out more what they are thinking and what they are wanting than it is to remain in session all the time without limitation, because certainly when they are not in session the Public Treasury will not be disturbed. For these reasons I favor the adoption of the limiting amendment.

Notwithstanding what I have said of "Old Hickory" Jackson, I think the times through which we are now going demand nothing so much as a President of the United States of his type. When he was chosen to lead the American troops at New Orleans at first there was a tie vote and the choice of the commander of the troops depended upon the Governor of Tennessee, who at that time happened to be Gov. Archibald Roane. It so happened that he was a distant relative of my own mother, and I am glad he had the good judgment and good sense to place the troops that were to fight at New Orleans under the command of General Jackson.

Mr. GIBSON. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. TILSON] and the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. MONTAGUE] have pointed out clearly that the amendment is unnecessary for the purpose of fixing the time for the meeting of sessions of Congress, since Congress, under the Constitution, now has the power to appoint the meeting times. All that is desired may be brought about by law rather than by the cumbersome method of a constitutional amendment.

Congress has acted under its granted power and appointed other days than the one fixed by the fundamental law on no less than 19 occasions.

The First Congress, with the full meaning of the Constitution fresh in the minds of the Members, passed an act setting January 4, 1790, as the date for the beginning of its next session. The following regular session appointed the fourth Monday in October, 1791, for its next meeting. The precedent was followed with frequency. The same date was selected at least ten times prior to 1821. The third and fourth Mondays in November were also chosen, as well as the fourth Monday in October. The short session was set by law on two occasions for the fourth Monday in May.

The gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. TILSON] has referred to the plan followed during the late part of the administration of President Johnson. The act of 1867 provided that—

> In addition to the present regular times of meeting of Congress there shall be a meeting of the Fortieth Congress of the United States and of each succeeding Congress thereafter at 12 o'clock meridian on the 4th day of March, the day on which the term begins for which the Congress is elected.

The Fortieth, Forty-first, and Forty-second Congresses convened in accordance with that law, which was repealed April 20, 1871.

Since that time we have departed from the intent of the Constitution that Congress should primarily fix the date for its meetings.

The Members of the early Congresses knew the meaning of the Constitution and followed it in spirit and letter. We can profit by their examples, and before this session adjourns fix a date for the meeting of the short session immediately after the coming elections so that more time will be available for the consideration of necessary legislation.

The last session of the Seventy-first Congress could have fixed March 4, 1931, for the convening of the present Congress and thereby have shortened the time between the date of the election of the Members and the actual commencement of their legislative work from 13 months to 4 months.

I will vote for the resolution that it may be submitted to the States for consideration, and because there appears a widespread demand for its approval. I do this with full knowledge that there is nothing constructive or liberal in the section that deals with the convening of Congress.

Mr. REILLY. Mr. Speaker, the principal purpose of the joint resolution now before the House is to amend the Constitution of the United States so as to provide a new date for the commencement of the terms of the President, Vice President, and the Members of Congress, and a new date for the assembling of Congress.

This proposed amendment provides that the terms of the President and Vice President shall begin on the 24th day of January at noon and the terms of Senators and Representatives at noon on the 4th day of January of the years in which such terms would have ended if this article had not been ratified; and that the terms of their successors shall then begin.

This amendment further provides that Congress shall assemble at least once in every year, and such meetings shall begin at noon on the 4th day of January in each year unless Congress shall by law appoint a different day.

The amendment also changes and supplements present constitutional provisions as to the election of President by the House in case a President should not be elected by the Electoral College, and also supplements provisions for filling all vacancies in case of death or disability of the President and President elect.

Sections 3 and 4 of this proposed amendment read as follows:

> SEC. 3. If the President elect dies, then the Vice President elect shall become President. If a President is not chosen before the time fixed for the beginning of his term, or if the President elect fails to qualify, then the Vice President elect shall act as President until a President has qualified; and the Congress may by law provide for the case where a President elect nor a Vice President elect has qualified, declaring who shall then act as President, or the manner in which a qualified person shall be selected, and such person shall act accordingly until a President or Vice President has qualified.
> SEC. 4. The Congress may by law provide for the case of the death of any of the persons from whom the House of Representatives may choose a President whenever the right of choice devolves upon them, and for the case of the death of any of the persons from whom the Senate may choose a Vice President whenever the right of choice devolves upon them.

Under this amendment the newly elected Congress will count the electoral votes, and in case no candidate shall receive a majority in the Electoral College shall choose the President of the United States, and the Senate, including the new Members, shall choose the Vice President of the United States, instead of the electoral vote being counted and the President and Vice President being elected by the old House and the Senate, as provided by the Constitution at the present time.

This amendment will cut short the term of Congressmen and Senators and the President and Vice President in office at the time of its adoption two months. In other words, the terms of their successors will begin two months earlier, and consequently the old terms will be two months shorter. Under this amendment the House of Representatives has the power to choose a President whenever the right devolves upon it, after the time fixed for the beginning of this term—in the event that it should not be able to choose a President before that time. Congress has the power to provide by law who would act as President until a President or Vice President should be elected.

This, of course, all pertains to when there is no choice in the Electoral College. At the present time in case the President elect should die, there is some doubt as to whether or not the Vice President elect should become President of the United States. This amendment specifically provides that in case of the death of the President elect before he assumes office, the Vice President shall become President of the United States.

Under this amendment, Congress is given power to provide by law for the case where neither the President nor Vice President has qualified before the time fixed for the beginning of their terms, no matter what the reason for such failure to qualify. This situation is not covered by any provision in the present Constitution.

This amendment also does away with the so-called short session or "lame-duck" session of Congress, and that is where it gets its name. This constitutional amendment has been before Congress for more than 10 years.

It has passed the United States Senate at least one-half dozen times and has been favorably reported by committees of the House several times. It was passed by both Houses of Congress in the last session, but because of an amendment attached to the resolution in the House, it died in conference.

While the amendment works out more carefully the constitutional provisions providing for emergencies in the matter of naming the President and the Vice President of the United States, the important purpose attempted to be accomplished by this amendment is to do away with the short session of Congress, or the second session of Congress, wherein oftentimes the President and certain Members of the House and Senate function as lawmakers, for three months notwithstanding the fact that at the last general election they may have been repudiated by the electorate.

Under the present constitutional system we elect a Congressman and a United States Senator in November of an even year and these elected and chosen lawmakers of the people do not and are not permitted to take their offices as lawmakers, unless a special session of Congress is called, until 13 months after their election.

This situation may have been necessary in the early years of our Republic when we did not have the facilities for travel and communication that we have to-day, and when the Members of the Senate were elected by State legislatures, that did not meet until several months after the November elections; but now all this is changed.

We are living in a day and age when science and invention have annihilated space and time, and travel is not only easy, but rapid, and when every hamlet in our land has in its evening papers the happenings not only of our country, but also of the whole world in the last 24 hours.

Again, the function of State legislatures in choosing the United States Senators has been done away with and a Senator is ready to perform as a legislator the day after his election in November, just the same as a United States Congressman.

If this amendment is adopted, the Congress elected in November will assemble on January 4, following the November election, unless Congress should determine another date by law.

Of course, as is well known under the present Constitution, Congress must assemble on the first Monday of each year unless Congress should fix another date by law.

It is a fact, however, that during the period following the Civil War, when the country was in a great state of excitement and turmoil, Congress, by statute, appointed March 4, or soon thereafter, for the meeting of each succeeding Congress, and for about six years this was the law, until the passions of the Civil War had cooled down, and the law was repealed and Congress went back to the original provision of the Constitution regarding the meetings of Congress, from which no subsequent Congress has departed.

Under the present Constitution, the terms of the office of President and Vice President and of the Members of both Houses of Congress begin and end on the same day, March 4. Under this proposed amendment the terms of the Members of the United States Senate and the House of Representatives begin on January 4 and the terms of the office of the President and Vice President begin on January 24. This arrangement was made necessary by the fact that the new Congress must meet in session prior to the beginning of the term of office of the President and Vice President in order to enable Congress to count the votes of the electoral college and decide who is to be President and Vice President of the United States.

Under the present Constitution the old House, in the short or "lame-duck" session, performed this duty, while under this amendment it becomes necessary to call the newly elected Senators and Representatives of the House together at an earlier date in order to perform the constitutional functions of counting the electoral votes or of electing a President or Vice President in case the electoral college failed to make a choice.

The attempt to make a part of this amendment a provision increasing the term of office of the Members of the House of Representatives from two to four years was wisely defeated, in my judgment. While under the present plan a Congressman has only a few months service in Washington, before he is obliged to stand for reelection, under the new plan, as provided by this amendment, he will take office and become a legislative functioning Congressman about one year earlier and he will have plenty of time within which to exemplify, to his constituents, his merits as a legislator.

In the first place, the proposal to change the term of the Members of the House of Representatives from two to four years is a new and distinct constitutional proposition. While the proposal to fix a new date for the meeting of Congress and to do away with the short session or the lame-duck session of Congress has been widely discussed in and out of Congress and I believe the people are ready to vote upon that proposition at this time. The people are waiting for the submission of this amendment. The tacking on to this amendment of a proposal to increase a Congressman's term might defeat the amendment entirely.

On the other hand, I am opposed to putting into this amendment or any other amendment the proposal to increase the term of a Representative in Congress from two to four years. While it may be a hardship upon Members of this House to make a campaign every two years, still, the fact is that this is the popular body of Congress, and in the election of Congressmen every two years, the people have the right, a right that ought to remain with the people, to change national governmental policies.

The men who framed our Constitution wisely provided that every two years the people would have the right to approve or disapprove of the rule of the party in power. To take from the people this right and to give them that privilege only every four years would be to strike a fatal blow to popular government.

I never expect to see the time come when the States of this Union, either through their legislatures or constitutional conventions, will ever take away from the people the right of the biennial opportunity now given to them for approving or disapproving the conduct of our national affairs.

I also think that this House wisely defeated this amendment to this joint resolution providing that in each even-numbered year the said session of Congress shall not continue after noon on the fourth day of June. Under the present Constitution the so-called short session in the odd-numbered years must expire on the 4th day of March, after a session of only three months, for the reason that the terms of all Congressmen and one-third of the Senators end every two years, on March 8; but if this amendment is adopted the situation will be changed and there will be no reason for terminating a session of Congress in the odd years on a certain definite date.

The State legislature of my State is not subject to any constitutional provision as to when its sessions should adjourn.

Congress should adjourn when its business is finished, no sooner and no later. Congress should adjourn when the President and the Members of both Houses agree that an adjournment should take place and not before. I include the President in this agreement, because if Congress should adjourn contrary to the views of the President he would have the privilege of calling it back in a special session.

By adopting an amendment limiting the length of a session of Congress, this Congress will convey to the world that in its judgment Congress is incapable of determining as to how long it should remain in session.

I believe that the Congress can be trusted to determine the length of its own sessions. I believe that much ill-considered legislation has been passed by Congress in the short sessions, because of the fact that Congress must adjourn on a certain date, which said fixed date of adjournment prevented the giving of such legislation the necessary consideration.

I am in favor of the so-called "lame-duck" amendment without any amendments, so that it may go to the people carrying the principal idea that, in the future or after its adoption, there will be no short sessions of Congress, and there will be no legislating in this country by a Congress or a President after they have been repudiated at the polls.

WASHINGTON, THE NATION'S CAPITAL

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, outside of their own community the people of this Nation are more interested in the city of Washington than any city in the country. This is very properly so, because Washington is the Nation's Capital, its seat of government, destined to be the most beautiful capital city in the world.

Housing, as it does, the offices wherein the Government's business is transacted, there is also within its borders hundreds of interesting places which no doubt accounts for the millions that visit this city every year.

During 1932 this city will be the scene of the celebration of the two hundredth anniversary of the birth of the Father of our Country, Gen. George Washington. Starting February 22 and continuing throughout the year, various events interesting as well as educational will be staged. Probably more of our citizens will come to Washington in 1932 than ever before in its history.

Ceded to the Government by the States of Maryland and Virginia, Washington is an independent city, known as the District of Columbia. Congress is its legislative body, and its affairs are handled by a board of commissioners provided for by an act of Congress. It has no representation in the Halls of Congress and its citizens have never been accorded the right of suffrage. For years this has been a topic of discussion and some day, no doubt, an amendment to the Constitution will be presented to the States that will provide for a change in existing conditions.

In view of the fact that millions of our citizens, your constituents and mine, will visit the seat of government in 1932; it is only fitting that something should be said in reference to this interesting city at this time.

Visitors are ever reminded of our first President during their stay in this city by Washington's Monument. It is 555 feet in height and can be seen from any part of the city. Another memorial to Washington that every visitor should see is Mount Vernon, where he lived and died. It is but a few miles from the city, and the Government, in connection with the 1932 celebration, has provided a wonderful new highway that leads to its gates.

The Lincoln Memorial, for which that great Missourian, Champ Clark, was mainly responsible, is one of the outstanding pieces of architecture in the United States.

It was in Ford's Theater on Tenth Street between E and F Streets, where President Lincoln was shot. He was carried across the street to a residence where he died. Congress recently provided for the reconstruction of Ford's Theater and it now houses an interesting collection of articles formerly the property of Lincoln and is now known as the Lincoln Museum.

Among the many public buildings that should be visited are the White House, the Capitol, the Library of Congress, the two museums under the control of the Smithsonian Institution. Missourians will be interested in the old National Museum because, among the thousands of exhibits, will be found, as soon as you enter the main door, hanging from the ceiling the Spirit of St. Louis, the plane used by Col. Charles A. Lindbergh in his flight across the Atlantic. The White House can be visited any morning. In the afternoon a trip to the Bureau of Engraving and Printing, where the currency is printed, as well as Government securities, stamps, etc., will be interesting.

Arlington Cemetery, formerly the home of Gen. Robert E. Lee, is across the river in Virginia and can be reached by passing over the new $10,000,000 Memorial Bridge. The new driveway will take you to the Tomb of the Unknown Soldier and the Arlington Amphitheater. This cemetery is the last resting place of generals and admirals, majors, captains and colonels, lieutenants, nurses, and privates who served in the Military and Naval Establishments. Heroes of the Civil, Mexican, Indian, Spanish, and World Wars are buried within its gates. To the south of the cemetery is Fort Meyer, a cavalry post.

Of recent construction is the new Department of Commerce Building, four blocks long, and the new building housing the Bureau of Internal Revenue. Four other buildings are in course of construction, but a look at the completed buildings will give one an idea of what new Washington will resemble when all the buildings are completed.

The Treasury Building, under the roof of which is housed more gold and silver than under any other in the world, is east of the White House. The beautiful State, War, and Navy Building is on the west of the White House. Throughout the city will be found Government buildings, all more or less interesting, many with historical backgrounds.

Washington is a city of parks and has one of the finest zoos in the country.

National societies have set up in Washington their headquarters and many scientific organizations have their own buildings and museums. It is also an art center and visitors interested in art should see the Freer Gallery as well as the Corcoran Art Gallery.

Its churches are not surpassed anywhere. There is now under construction a new Episcopal Cathedral to cost in the neighborhood of $25,000,000; the Shrine of the Immaculate Conception, to cost an equal amount, which will be located on the grounds of the Catholic University. They are partly completed and should not be overlooked. In the Episcopal Cathedral crypts are the remains of the late President Wilson and Admiral Dewey.

The Franciscan Monastery, in the northeast section of the city, constructed by the friars, is a replica of the monastery in the Holy Land and the American citizen who has never had an opportunity to go abroad is afforded a chance to learn of the customs of the past and the activities of this religious order. Its crypts, its catacombs, its altars, works of art, and its grounds have historical significance.

Outstanding among the buildings in Washington is the Capitol. Therefore it is my purpose to dwell at some length on this historical building.

A TRIP AROUND THE CAPITOL

In order to understand the Capitol, we must not only see its architecture, examine its works of art, but we must know something of its history. We are now standing at the east entrance of the basement floor of the Capitol, known as the Supreme Court entrance. At our left is a large tablet commemorating the one hundredth anniversary of the laying of the corner stone of the Capitol on September 18, 1793. The corner stone was laid by President George Washington, and Masonic lodges participated in the exercises. The corner stone is not visible. The records show it was laid in the southeast corner and that it was necessary to descend into a trench in order to lay the corner stone. Consequently, this historic stone is below the ground level at the present time.

When Congress removed to Washington from Philadelphia and the Government was moved here in the year of 1800, there was but one rectangular building standing, and it is in the southeast corner of this rectangular building that the cornerstone was laid. The dimensions of the building were as follows: Length, 134 feet; width, 120 feet. These are approximate dimensions, and both the north wing and the south wing form a part of the circular wall of the present rotunda.

Entering the Capitol Building by the Supreme Court entrance, we find ourselves in a small vestibule. In this vestibule are six historic columns called by some "the cornstalk columns." These columns were designed by Latrobe and executed by Giuseppe Franzoni in the year 1809. These columns were here when the Capitol was burned by the British in 1814. They are the oldest examples of architectural decorations in the Capitol Building.

At our right as we enter this vestibule we find a door leading to the law library of the Supreme Court. We may enter if we will be very quiet for the readers must not be disturbed. This room was the old Senate Chamber and was originally two stories in height. After the Capitol was burned by the British and the restoration was commenced, the arrangement was changed so that the Senate Chamber occupied the space immediately above this and the Supreme Court used the present law library as a court room. In the center of the curved space to the west side of the hall is a bas-relief of Justice, the work of Giuseppe Franzoni.

Proceeding to the central portion of this Supreme Court section of the building, we find a rotunda, two stories in height. This lower story is supported by large square columns. Proceeding we come to a tiled vestibule, 44 feet long, which connects the old building with the present Senate wing. This vestibule is paved with tile made at Stoke-upon-Trent, England. In fact, all of the tile floor of the Senate wing is composed of tile of this character. This vestibule represents the extreme north end of the old Capitol.

We proceed northward and enter what is known as the Senate wing of the Capitol. We are still in the basement of the Capitol. At our right are telegraph offices and the Senate restaurant, dignified by the somewhat ancient name of "refectory." Upon this floor we find many mural decorations. There are two corridors running east and west. We find in these corridors much that would interest the visitor in the way of mural decorations. These decorations are not duplicated in the basement floor of the House wing of the Capitol. It should be remembered that when this Capitol was erected there was no provision made for elevators, neither for electric lighting. Changes have been made from time to time to accommodate the introduction of elevators and an electric-lighting system as well as such further improvements as air conditioning and steam heating.

By an elevator we come to the main floor of the Senate. Passing out of the door at the east end of the main corridor we find ourselves on a portico giving us an extended view of the park area to the east of the building. At our left we can see the Union Station, the Senate Office Building, at the east the Library of Congress and an unimproved area similar to the area of tne Library of Congress where the Supreme Court of the United States will be located. At our right and at the south we can see the House Office Building and the new House Office Building now in course of construction. The doors through which we enter this portico are ornamented by two bronze doors called "the Crawford bronze doors," typifying and illustrating early periods of American history. Over this door is a sculptural group representing History and Justice, the work of Thomas Crawford and practically the only work relating to the Capitol completed under his supervision. We should not forget, however, that the pediment over the portico at the east of the Capitol is ornamented by sculptural work designed by Thomas Crawford and executed here in Washington by artists working from the Crawford models. This pediment represents the progress of American civilization and the decadence of the Indian inhabitants.

Returning to the Senate wing we find at our right a large reception room used by those waiting to see the Senators, and from this room the cards are sent in to the floor of the Senate. The side walls and ceiling of this room are beautifully decorated, and the room is lighted by two prism chandeliers of cut glass. Proceeding by a cross corridor we come to the grand eastern staircase built of Tennessee marble. On this staircase is a celebrated painting by W. H. Powell entitled "The Battle of Lake Erie." This painting covers the entire area of the east wall of the staircase. At the foot of the staircase on our right is a heroic-size statue of Benjamin Franklin, the work of Hiram Powers. Turning through the south corridor of the main floor of the Senate, we find upon the walls portraits of distinguished citizens of the United States, formerly connected with the legislative branch of the Government. Clay, Calhoun, Morrill, Allison, Sumner, and Webster may be seen upon the walls. In niches on the north side are busts of those who have been Vice Presidents of the United States. Further along the corridor we find portraits of John Langdon, Abraham Lincoln, Andrew Jackson, George Washington, Thomas Jefferson, John Adams, and Patrick Henry. The visitor ought to spend a few minutes in examination of the beautiful tile floors to be found in this corridor.

At the west end of the corridor we come to the west grand staircase. This is built of white marble. At our right is a statue of John Hancock, by Horatio Stone, placed upon a pedestal from the Hancock home in Massachusetts. This pedestal is inscribed "He wrote his name where all the nations could behold it, and where all time should not efface it."

In the niches of the gallery floor of the Senate Chamber are busts of former Vice Presidents. A list of busts of Vice Presidents of the United States in the Senate Chamber and the Senate wing of the Capitol follows:

[1] Died. [2] Resigned.

Some of the desks of the Senate Chamber are from the old Senate Chamber and when additional desks were necessary owing to the admission of new States and election of new Senators therefrom, desks following the patterns of the old desks were manufactured to supply the need.

The Vice President's room contains furniture of more than ordinary elegance, mahogany desk, chair, side tables, and a clock of which the case is also mahogany. On the east wall is a large portrait of Washington by Rembrandt Peale. This portrait formerly hung in the old Senate Chamber. There are also on the east wall two busts, one of Lafayette S. Foster, sometime a President pro tempore of the Senate, and of Henry Wilson, former Senator and a Vice President of the United States. The bust of Wilson is the first bust of a Vice President of the United States to be purchased by the Government. A bronze tablet was designed by the Henry-Bonnard Bronze Co., the copy for which is said to have been furnished by Senator George F. Hoar. The inscription upon this tablet is as follows:

In this room Henry Wilson, Vice President of the United States and a Senator for eighteen years, died November 22, 1875. The son of a farm laborer, never at school more than twelve months, in youth a journeyman shoemaker, he raised himself to the high places of fame, honor, and power, and, by unwearied study, made himself an authority in the history of his country and of liberty, and an eloquent public speaker to whom Senate and people eagerly listened. He dealt with and controlled vast public expenditure during a great civil war, yet lived and died poor, and left to his grateful countrymen the memory of an honorable public service, and a good name far better than riches.

Proceeding west, we come to the marble room, retiring room for Senators. Here are found easy chairs, current newspapers, reading stands supplied with bookcases. The side walls are of Tennessee marble.

We now come to the President's room, the richest room, containing the most elaborate decorations of any room in the Capitol. The decorations on the side walls and ceiling are by Constantino Brumidi. The portraits on the side walls are those of Washington's first Cabinet. The ceiling decoration is of group pictures representing Executive, Liberty, Legislation, and Religion. In the corners are portraits of Franklin, Brewster, Columbus, and Vespucius, two Americans and two explorers. In the southwest corner of the room is a bronze bust of William McKinley by Emma Cadwalader-Guild.

Facing the President's room is one of the private entrances by which the Senators pass to the rooms below. There are four of these stairways in the Capitol, two upon the House side and two upon the Senate side. They are similar in design.

Proceeding up the west staircase and reaching the corridor floor we find on the west wall of the staircase a large painting of the Battle of Chapultepec, painted by James Walker, an artist who was in the City of Mexico at the time of the commencement of the breaking out of the Mexican War. He remained secreted for some time, finally escaped at night, joined the American forces, and acted as guide and interpreter, remaining with the forces during the Conquest of Mexico.

In this corridor and facing the Battle of Chapultepec is a large portrait of Washington in the uniform of the Commander in Chief of the American Army. This portrait was painted by Charles Willson Peale in the year 1799.

Proceeding to the south gallery corridor of the Senate wing we find the entrance doors by which visitors are admitted to the gallery. On the south side of the wall and on either side of the entrance of the Senate document room are portraits of Hon. Henry Latimer, M. D., and Hon. James Latimer, both citizens of Delaware and intimately connected with the early history of that State. At the east end of the corridor are four historic paintings by John Blake White relating to incidents connected with the Revolutionary War. Passing around to the east corridor of the gallery floor we obtain a better view of the Battle of Lake Erie, the largest canvas in the Capitol. Facing the Battle of Lake Erie is the Recall of Columbus, by A. G. Heaton, depicting an important event in the life of Columbus and the turning point which led to the possibility of his discovery of America.

We have now reached the east corridor of the Senate wing. On pedestals we find busts of Lincoln, Pulaski, Charles Sumner, James Bryce, Giuseppe Garibaldi, Zachary Taylor, Aysh-ke-bah-ke-ko-zhay (Chippewa Chief) and Be-sheck-kee; also the bust of Kosciusko. On the east wall are portraits in mosaic of Lincoln and Garfield, the work of Salviati, which were presented through Tiffany Bros. of New York. On the north wall is a portrait of John A. Dix, memorable for his famous sentence "If any man attempts to haul down the American flag, shoot him on the spot." Also on the north wall is the largest portrait group to be found in the Capitol entitled "The Florida Case." The portraits in this picture are careful studies of the persons represented, made by the artist Mrs. Cornelia Adele Fassett.

In the north room of this east corridor are located two large paintings by Thomas Moran, the Grand Canyon of the Yellowstone and the Chasm of the Colorado. On the south wall of this room is a painting entitled "Niagara in Winter" by Regis Gignoux. There is also a bust of Thomas Crawford, the sculptor whose works are so well represented throughout the Capitol. This bust is by Tomaso Gagliardi.

Passing down the east staircase, we return to the south corridor of the Senate and thence pass through the central portion of the Capitol. On our right are the offices of the clerk of the Supreme Court. On our left is the Supreme Court Room, well worth a visit. Around the wall of the Supreme Court Room are busts of former Chief Justices of the United States, nine in number. The bust of Chief Justice Taft has not at the present time been added to the collection. This room was the Senate Chamber until 1860. Back of the seats of the Justices is a screen of columns with an interior facing of walnut paneling. In this space are also two very ancient mantels. The exact history of these mantels has never been clearly determined. They belong to a very early period, undoubtedly of the restoration of the Capitol, after it was burned by the British. The upper right and left hand central panels present a garland of 13 stars representing the thirteen original States. In the central panel is a figure of the assembling of sticks, representing the union of the States. In the extreme right and left are garlands of wheat and in a long panel or stiles of the mantel are sculptural representations of faces with the liberty cap. The northern mantelpiece bears similar decorations, except that in the central panel is a figure of a stalwart man attempting to break over his knee the bundle of sticks representing the union of the States.

The room south of the Supreme Court Room is the office of the marshal of the United States Supreme Court. It is said that in this room the first meetings of the Supreme Court were held in January, 1801.

Passing toward the rotunda, we enter a smaller rotunda by which we can see the floor below. This rotunda marks the location of the old double staircase existing when the Capitol was burned August 24, 1814. In the rebuilding, the staircase was omitted. The ceiling is supported by columns known as "the tobacco columns," for the reason that the capitals of the columns are formed from tobacco leaves arranged in a conventional manner. These capitals were executed by Francisco Iardella in 1816. On the west side of the corridor is a door leading to the dome, a long walk of 365 steps.

We now enter the rotunda of the Capitol. The old Capitol, as it is sometimes termed, represented three separate building operations: The construction of the Supreme Court section completed and ready for occupancy in 1801; the Statuary Hall section completed and ready for occupancy in 1811; and this central portion in which the corner stone was laid in 1818 and which was completed in 1825.

On the walls of this rotunda are eight historical paintings. Those on the east side of the central line represent pre-American history; those on the west side of this central line represent periods of the Revolutionary War. On the east side, the first painting at the north is the Embarkation of the Pilgrims, by Robert Walter Weir; the next the Landing of Columbus, by John Vanderlyn; the next painting is the Discovery of the Mississippi River by De Soto, by William H. Powell, who also painted the Battle of Lake Erie. The last painting on the east side is the Baptism of Pocahontas, by John G. Chapman. This painting was completed in this city in premises in the rear of a dwelling house on G Street. On the west side, the first picture to the south is the Signing of the Declaration of Independence, the next toward the north is the Surrender of General Burgoyne, the third painting is the Surrender of Lord Cornwallis, and the last picture on the west side is Washington Resigning His Commission. The last four paintings are by John Trumbull.

In this rotunda may be found four marble statues, one bronze statue, and three busts. The busts are Lafayette, by David d'Angers; bronze bust of Washington, by the same artist; a bronze statue of Jefferson, by the same artist; a plaster statue of Washington after the original marble, by Houdon in Richmond; a marble statue of Alexander Hamilton, by Horatio Stone; marble statue of Baker, by Horatio Stone; marble statue of Grant, by Franklin Simmons; statue of Lincoln, by Vinnie Ream, afterwards Mrs. Hoxie; and head of Lincoln, by Gutzon Borglum. Over the four entrance doors are high relief groups, the one over the south door being that of Boone and the Indian, over the north door Penn's Treaty with the Indians, over the east door the Landing of the Pilgrims, and over the west door Pocahontas Saving the Life of John Smith.

We must not omit in our visit to the rotunda to pay some attention to the large painting forming the ceiling of the rotunda, 180 feet above the floor where we are standing. This painting represents the apotheosis of Washington, encircled by 13 female figures, the head of each crowned with a star. These figures represent the 13 States: Delaware, Pennsylvania, New Jersey, Georgia, Connecticut, Massachusetts, Maryland, South Carolina, New Hampshire, Virginia, New York, North Carolina, and Rhode Island. These figures are represented geographically and not in the order in which the States adopted the Federal Constitution. When we consider that this work is 180 feet above the floor of the rotunda and that it is composed of two circular compositions, the inner representing the circle of the 13 States, the outer representing War, Agriculture, Mechanics, Commerce, Marine, and the Arts and Sciences, we may properly appreciate the merit of this work. This large painting is the work of Constantino Brumidi.

High up on the walls of the rotunda is a series in fresco representing epochs in American history. This series has never been completed. The work is that of Constantino Brumidi and Filippo Costaggini.

While visiting the rotunda, we should get a view of the city to the eastward from the central entrance or portico of the Capitol. As we move to the east we see at our left hand a group of statuary, by Horatio Greenough, called "The Rescue Group," and a group of statuary at our right hand called "The Discovery Group," by Luigi Persico.

We are now facing the east main entrance of the Capitol. This is the location where all of the inaugural ceremonies attending the inauguration of a President are held. Large platforms are erected seating thousands of people stretching along the east line of the Capitol Building. On those occasions the grounds and all available space to the east are filled with spectators, for although they may not be able to be close to the inaugural stand, by the process of amplification the visitors are able to hear for some two squares distant from the platform the voice of the President as he delivers his inaugural address. In niches in the wall of the Capitol are found two statues, one in the right hand, the Statue of War, the other in the left hand, the Statue of Peace. These statues date from the year 1843 and are the work of Luigi Persico. Over the main entrance is a decorative bas-relief showing the crowning of Washington. This work is by Capellano, the Florentine sculptor, and dates from the year 1825. We must also look at the bronze doors modeled somewhat after the bronze doors of the Baptistry of Florence. These doors are known as the "Roger Doors," sometimes called the "Columbus Doors," for the reason that the panels depict incidents in the life of Columbus. These doors were cast in Munich at the Royal Bavarian Foundry and were first put up at the south entrance of Statuary Hall and afterwards removed and placed in their present location. The pediment is by Luigi Persico, said to be after a design by John Quincy Adams, then President of the United States. There were 30 competitors for the honor of filling this space with statuary but the commission was finally given to Mr. Persico from suggestions by the President.

A visit to the portico of the west front of the Capitol at this time is well worth our attention. This gives us a wonderful view of all of the city to the westward. At our right hand is the Capitol walk leading to Pennsylvania Avenue at the foot of which is the Peace Monument. At our left hand is the Capitol walk leading to Maryland Avenue. At the foot of this Avenue is the Garfield statue. We can see the Washington Monument, New National Museum, Smithsonian Institution, Lincoln Memorial, the far-off hills of Virginia, the Potomac River, and church spires at our right and at our left. This portico is the work of Charles Bulfinch, and seems to be the only portion of the work of Bulfinch that is specifically his own. Bulfinch was the architect in charge of the erection of the central portion of the Capitol; the plans, however, had been prepared long before his appointment to this position. This portico, however, seems to have his own introduction of his idea of the best treatment of this important portion of the building. All this west front of the Capitol and the central portion was formerly occupied by the Library of Congress before the present Library Building was erected and occupied in 1897.

Leaving the rotunda and proceeding to the south, at our right we find a staircase with stone steps leading to the gallery of the old Hall of the House of Representatives. This hall is now known as Statuary Hall. In 1864 by an act of Congress it was set apart as Statuary Hall. This is probably the most beautiful room in the Capitol Building when considered from the standpoint of an architect. It was burned in 1814. At that time the hall was in the form of an ellipse or a rectangle abutting upon two half circles. The columns were Aquia Creek sandstone and were so badly damaged by fire they had to be removed. The new columns are of Breccia marble. The capitals are of Italian marble and were carved in Carrara, Italy. This carving was in charge of Giovanni Andrei, who was sent to Carrara, his home city, in 1815 to superintend the carving of these capitals to be used in the restoration of this hall. The side walls and the frieze are of Aquia Creek sandstone.

In 1864 Congress enacted a law providing that each State should be requested to send two statues in marble or bronze of deceased citizens such as the State may desire to commemorate in this manner. This Statuary Hall now contains 64 statues. A list of these statues follows:

Visitors from different States may find here representative citizens selected by the States for these places of honor.

The acoustics of the hall are very difficult and from certain points remarkable echoes can be heard. Not only was this hall unsuited on account of its form and arrangement for the purposes of a deliberative assembly, but the growth of the country made necessary a larger space for the meetings of the House of Representatives. The House met here until the 16th of November, 1857, when it moved to its new quarters in the wing where the present House is established. A low gallery surrounds the curvature of this auditorium. Immediately over the northern door is a group called "The Car of History," or "The Franzoni Group." This work was executed by Carlo Franzoni in 1819. Carlo Franzoni was a younger brother of Giuseppe Franzoni, whose work we have seen in the cornstalk columns in the Supreme Court entrance of the Capitol.

On the south wall of Statuary Hall, high above the frieze, is a plaster statue of Liberty, by Enrico Causici. On the frieze immediately over the south entrance to Statuary Hall is an eagle with extended wings, the work of Giuseppe Valaperti, and the only work of this sculptor known to exist in this country. This belongs to the period of the restoration in 1816.

Proceeding to the south we pass through an archway formerly occupied by the Columbus doors. On our right is the bust of James R. Mann, formerly a prominent Republican Member of the House of Representatives. On the left is the bust of Champ Clark, of Missouri, popular Democratic Speaker of the House. Just before entering the corridor running east and west in the north corridor of the Hall of the House of Representatives we find on our right a bust of Martin B. Madden, for some time chairman of the House Committee on Appropriations. On our left is a bust of Claude Kitchin, majority leader during the administration of Woodrow Wilson. Proceeding around the corridor to the east we may see from the northern windows of this corridor an excellent view of the east grounds of the Capitol. On pleasant days all available parking space is occupied by automobiles.

At the foot of the east grand staircase of the House of Representatives we find a marble statue of Thomas Jefferson, the work of Hiram Powers. This statue and the statue of Franklin on the Senate side and a bust of Chief Justice Marshall are the only examples of the work of this celebrated sculptor of the period from 1850 to 1857. Facing the east grand staircase is the large painting by Francis B. Carpenter entitled "The First Reading of the Emancipation Proclamation." The picture is more properly known as "The Emancipation Proclamation" or "Lincoln and his Cabinet." This staircase follows closely in marble and architecture the east staircase of the Senate, Tennessee marble being used in both east staircases.

We are now in the House wing of the Capitol. At the time of its construction the House wing and the Senate wing were designated as "Extensions to the Capitol." The cornerstone of these extensions was laid in the northeast corner of the House wing of the Capitol on July 4, 1851, by Millard Fillmore, then President of the United States. The principal oration on that occasion was made by Daniel Webster, then Secretary of State. The architect of these wings was Thomas U. Walter.

Architects in considering the Capitol as a whole and bearing in mind the fact that it comprises four different building operations, are free to admit that as a completed whole it has no lack of unity and that it is not only the Capitol but the most beautiful monumental building existing in the United States.

The old Capitol had a low dome. The present dome was included in the building operations of the extensions. That is, the Senate wing, the House wing, and the new dome of the Capitol were followed along the same building plan and under the charge of the same architect. The House of Representatives, the finest deliberative body of the world, occupied its new quarters for the first time on the 16th of November, 1857. The Senate moved from the present Supreme Court Room to the present Senate Chamber in January, 1860.

We find on the gallery floor of the House the same decorative treatment of the floors in tile that is found in the Senate wing. Facing the First Reading of the Emancipation Proclamation, we are enabled to see the portraits of all of the members of President Lincoln's Cabinet as it existed in 1863. This picture is seen at the best advantage at a little after 12 o'clock on a bright day. On such occasions there is abundant light to bring out all of the features of this wonderful painting. This canvas was painted in the White House. It was criticized from time to time by President Lincoln. Shortly after his death it was exhibited in all of the large cities of the United States and many engravings of this picture were sold at the time of the exhibition. The picture was finally presented to the Government by Mrs. Elizabeth Thompson. Public exercises, presentation, and acceptance were held in the Hall of the House of Representatives.

From this gallery floor we are able to see on the wall facing the Emancipation Proclamation picture a large painting of Henry Clay, by John Neagle. Also, a portrait of Gunning Bedford, jr., by Charles Willson Peale, and north of the portrait of Henry Clay, the portrait of Charles Carroll of Carrollton, by Chester Harding.

The west grand staircase contains a large mural painting called "Westward the Course of Empire Takes Its Way." The painting is by Emanuel Leutze and historically the picture marks a period during which work was nearly suspended in the Capitol. In the dark days of 1862 Emanuel Leutze completed this picture and for a time it was about the only work of importance that was carried on in the Capitol Building. The picture is graphic in its portrayal of the hardships of the immigrants who were moving to the West. All types of these hardy pioneers are found in this painting.

Facing the mural decoration Westward the Course of Empire Takes Its Way is a large seated portrait of Chief Justice Marshall, by Richard N. Brooke. This picture is a copy of an original by W. D. Washington now in the court house at Warrenton, Va. It shows the Chief Justice wearing his robe of office, with a background for the painting, strongly reminiscent of the old chamber of the Supreme Court now occupied by the law library of that court.

At the foot of the west grand staircase is the bronze bust of Be-sheck-kee, Chippewa chief. This bust is a replica in bronze of the bust in the Senate wing, by Vincenti.

The floors of the main and basement floors of the House wing of the Capitol are now tiled with marble replacing the highly ornamental tile such as now exists in the Senate wing of the Capitol. This was necessary on account of the wear which had occurred in the more than one-half century that this tile had been in place, and for the further reason that it was impossible to secure additional tile of the same pattern to replace damaged spaces.

From the east portico of the House wing we are able to secure a much better view of the Library of Congress, House Office Building, and the new House Office Building. At our left, close in line with the House Office Building, is the church spire of St. Peter's Church.

The bronze doors of the House side were designed by Crawford, but completed by W. H. Rinehart. They contain three panels and a medallion, picturing events in American history. The subjects portrayed upon the House doors are: Upper panel, left-hand door, the Massacre of Wyoming, July 17, 1778; center, the Battle of Lexington, April 19, 1775; lower, Presentation of Flag to Gen. William Moultrie for his Defense of Sullivans Island, Charleston Harbor, June 28, 1776; and the medallion at the bottom shows the Death of General Montgomery, December 31, 1775. The upper panel of the right-hand door depicts the Declaration of Independence; below this the Paris Treaty of Peace between the United States and Great Britain, September 3, 1783; the next, Washington's Farewell to His Officers at New York, December 4, 1783; and the medallion at the bottom of the door contains a seated figure of Franklin.

The pediment over the House wing of the Capitol was unveiled August 2, 1916. The unveiling exercises were held on the lot immediately in front of the House wing of the Capitol. Interesting addresses were made by Champ Clark, then the Speaker of the House of Representatives, and by Paul W. Bartlett, the sculptor. The sculptural work in this pediment is considered to be one of the finest examples of work of this class in the United States. It was executed by Mr. Bartlett when he was at the full height of his powers of sculptural expression.

The Capitol Grounds contain 58.8 acres. The area to the north of the Capitol which is now being landscaped will, when completed, give to the entire Capitol Grounds an area of a little more than 120 acres.

Proceeding toward the south by the east corridor of the House wing of the Capitol we come to the Speaker's lobby. This space used to be occupied as offices for the Speaker, Sergeant at Arms, and one room for the members of the press. About 1879 additional openings were cut through to this corridor so that there might be an opportunity for ventilation from windows at the south. About that time there were hanging on the walls of the Speaker's room small portraits of former Speakers. These portraits have been given a place in the present room of the Speaker in the southeast corner of the building and the larger portraits have been introduced in this corridor between the floor of the House and the room occupied by Members when they desire to meet and discuss matters or to examine papers. A list of portraits of former Speakers in the Speaker's lobby follows:

The first portrait acquired of a former Speaker of the House of Representatives is the portrait of Henry Clay, by Giuseppe Fagnani. This portrait was given to the Congress in 1852 and was accepted by the House and Senate at about the time of the death of Mr. Clay.

There are now 38 portraits, painted by different artists of the United States. The most conspicuous is probably the portrait of Thomas B. Reed, a Speaker from the State of Maine, the Fifty-first, Fifty-fourth, and Fifty-fifth Congresses. This portrait was painted by John S. Sargent, the most celebrated portrait painter of his period, and was presented to the House of Representatives by a large number of the admirers of Thomas B. Reed.

From this corridor there are four entrances to the Hall of the House of Representatives. The seating capacity of the Hall has been changed several times in order that the increase in membership might be accommodated. At the present time there are no separate desks for the Members. In this Hall at the right and left of the Speaker are portraits of Washington, by Vanderlyn, and of Lafayette, by Ary Scheffer. This last-named portrait was presented to the Congress by the artist in 1824 and was hung in the old Hall of the House of Representatives, now Statuary Hall, this being the first picture to be given a place upon the wall. In the southwest corner of the room is a mural by Constantino Brumidi. It has a rather long title, "Cornwallis Sues for Cessation of Hostilities under a Flag of Truce." This decoration was placed on the wall in 1857 for the purpose of giving the Members an idea of the effect of filling the wall spaces with paintings depicting American history. In later years there were added two paintings by Bierstadt, but they were not considered appropriate and are now occupying spaces in the corridor at the east and west ends of the Hall of the House. The clock over the north entrance to the Hall is flanked on either side by a figure of an Indian and a pioneer, the work of Rinehart, the sculptor from Frederick, Md., who is also represented by the bronze doors of the House wing of the Capitol. These bronze doors, as well as the bronze doors of the Senate, were cast at Chicopee, Mass. There are 435 Members of the House of Representatives.

On the north wall of the House Hall is a bronze tablet designed by Paul W. Bartlett. The text is by Charles E. Fairman and is as follows:

> Speakers of the House of Representatives of the United States. Chosen by the people, honored by the preferment of their associates, these makers of history are memorialized as a tribute of their worth to the Nation.

This tablet hangs underneath the portrait of Frederick Muhlenberg, the first Speaker of the House of Representatives.

At the east end of the Hall of the House is the Discovery of the Hudson River and at the west end of the Hall is the picture entitled "Entrance into Monterey," both paintings by Albert Bierstat. The last-mentioned painting contains a representation of the first celebration of mass in California by Father Junipero Serra. A statue of Father Serra has been erected in Statuary Hall, a gift from the State of California.

Proceeding by the broad staircase to the ground or basement floor of the House wing, in passing to the west we find upon our right and left the restaurant used by the House of Representatives.

It is worth while to visit this portion of the Capitol on account of the beautiful hall of the columns, reaching the entire width of the House wing from south to north. These columns are of American marble and have a variation of the Corinthian architecture. The capitals are formed to bear a strong resemblance to the tobacco leaves.

Proceeding northward, we pass through the House connection until we again enter the area formerly covered by the old Hall of the House of Representatives. On this floor are the offices of the doorkeeper, bookkeepers, different clerical offices relating to the House of Representatives. An eastern entrance seen at our right is said by some to be probably the entrance used by the British troops when they entered the House wing of the old Capitol on August 24, 1814. It should be remembered that at that time the central portion of the Capitol did not exist and all that there was of the Capitol were two detached rectangular buildings connected by a wooden walk about 125 feet in length.

We now continue to the north and pass through the crypt of the Capitol. Here we find many examples of the Doric architecture and the columns used to support the floor of the rotunda above. Here is also a group of statuary presented by the National Woman's Party to the United States in the year 1921. The group consists of three busts forming a part of a huge marble pedestal. These busts are of the pioneers in the woman's movement. They are Lucretia Mott, Susan B. Anthony, and Elizabeth Cady Stanton. The work was executed at Carrara, Italy, by Adelaide Johnson, and the large base upon which this block of marble rests was also from that far-off Italian city.

Continuing north, we come to a circular vestibule and at our right we find the entrance known as the "Supreme Court entrance" of the Capitol, the point where we started.

There are some statistical facts which will probably appeal to those interested in statistics. The Capitol contains 430 rooms now devoted to office, committee room and storage purposes, 679 windows, 550 doorways, and 140 fireplaces.

The Capitol is heated, lighted, and furnished with power from a central power plant located in Garfield Park. This power plant not only furnishes this service for the Capitol but similar service for the Senate Office Building, the House Office Building, the Library of Congress, the city post office, the Government Printing Office, and will furnish such service for the annex and addition to the Library of Congress, new House Office Building, Botanic Garden, and the Supreme Court of the United States when these buildings have been completed.

The length of the Capitol Building is 751 feet 4 inches. The height of the Statue of Freedom above the east base line of the Capitol is 287 feet 5½ inches. The weight of the Statue of Freedom is 14,985 pounds. The weight of the dome is 8,909,200 pounds. The number of steps to the dome is 365.

In 1929 the estimated value of the Capitol was $52,868,000, of which $37,500,000 is represented by the building.

The Capitol also contains 323 works of art, not including mural decorations and sculptural works, upon the exterior and in the Capitol grounds.

I am not only grateful but indebted to Mr. Charles E. Fairman, art curator and chief clerk of the architect's office, for his assistance in furnishing many of the interesting historical data that enabled me to present this information about the Capitol.

REGISTRATION AND VOTING IN RHODE ISLAND

Mr. CONDON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD and to include therein a copy of a bill which I introduced a few days ago.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. CONDON. Mr. Speaker, the Constitution vests in Congress the authority to prescribe the manner of holding elections for Senators and Representatives. Thus far this power has not been exercised but has been left to the several State legislatures. As a result the requirements for enrolling the qualified electors at such elections vary greatly in the various States. My State of Rhode Island, for example, has a peculiar provision requiring so-called registry voters to register their names with official boards of registration several months in advance of election day, at a time when there is little, if any, interest in political matters. The effect of such a requirement is to deprive thousands of voters of their rights and disqualify them as electors. Strange as it may seem, it is necessarily early in the spring of every election year to carry on an intensive and extensive campaign to acquaint the voters with the necessity of registering in order to vote in the following November. So fundamentally important is this campaign that it has become a political axiom in Rhode Island that elections are won in June and not in November.

The Rhode Island constitution requires registry voters to register their names with the local boards of canvassers and registration on or before the 30th day of June in the year of election otherwise they will not be qualified to vote in November. Manifestly such a requirement is calculated to keep many otherwise qualified voters from the polls, and that is exactly its effect. In an attempt, never wholly successful, to minimize the evil effect of this law, an organized concerted effort is undertaken in May and June to persuade the voter to register and safeguard his right to vote in the fall election. It is not easy at such a time, however, to arouse the voter from his accustomed lethargy and hence as the deadline approaches there rises the almost universal cry from press, pulpit, and platform, "Unless you register before the end of June you can not vote in November, and if you can not vote you are at the mercy of those who can."

Despite this widespread energetic appeal thousands fail to register, and at every election hundreds of men and women, otherwise qualified to vote, are turned away from every voting precinct in the State. The question naturally arises, Why do the people of the State tolerate such a condition which in effect works a wholesale disfranchisement of their fellow citizens? For the answer we must go back almost a century to the famous Dorr rebellion, the only instance on record in our national history where it was necessary for the people of a State to resort to arms to obtain their electoral rights as American citizens. At that time Rhode Island was without a constitution and was functioning as an American State under a royal charter granted by King Charles II in 1663. Under this charter only a freeholder could vote. Not until after the Dorr rebellion in 1842 was a constitution adopted which accorded to every citizen the right to vote; but as the electors who ratified it and the convention which framed it were limited exclusively to freeholders, this newly accorded right was hedged about with restrictions so as to discourage the great mass of the citizenry of the State from seeking to qualify as electors. One of these restrictions is the registration requirement mentioned above.

This constitution is as difficult to change as the ancient laws of the Medes and Persians. Since its adoption an incessant battle has been waged to alter and amend its archaic provisions, but its very article of amendment makes that all but impossible. And so this registration requirement remains embedded in this unalterable instrument of government—a monument to the ingenuity of these reactionary conservatives of a bygone day. The dead hand of the favorites of a royal charter stretches out from the grave to bar the way to hundreds of living American citizens in the exercise of their right to choose the Representatives who shall serve them in the greatest representative democracy in all the world.

The Democratic Party in Rhode Island, true to the traditions of its great founder, has waged for over a century a never-ending battle against this denial of the franchise, but always it has been opposed by the party of reaction, first the Federalists, then the Whigs, and now the Republicans. As the successor to the old Federalist and Whig Parties, the Republican Party inherited their distrust of the people and popular government and has sought in every way to prevent the masses of the electorate from participating in the government of the Commonwealth. As the Federalist remnants were cowed into granting a constitution by the Dorr rebellion, so the present Republican machine gives ground only when seriously threatened and alarmed. And so the fight for electoral rights in Rhode Island is still going on, with the Democratic Party championing the cause and confident that ultimate victory will be achieved. We ask no Federal aid in this fight; the battle for a free and unrestricted franchise for the election of State and local officers will be fought by citizens of the State within the State; but in so far as the right to vote for Senators and Representatives in Congress is impaired and the exercise thereof hindered by our antiquated local law we deem it just and proper to call upon Congress for a remedy which it is authorized and empowered to prescribe under its grant of power in the Federal Constitution.

Congress should no longer tolerate in its elections any State law which unfairly deprives thousands of voters of an opportunity to vote for Members of that body. Members of Congress are not merely delegates of and from the States which elect them; they are something of far greater importance, the representatives of all the people of this great Federal Union of States, and as such the guardians of their rights and liberties. Their mandate to sit and legislate in this Capitol in that exalted capacity ought to emanate from the solemnly expressed will of a majority of the largest possible number of qualified electors in each State and no unreasonable and unjust barriers should be placed in the way of such a number being officially enrolled and placed upon the voting lists. In this way, and in this way only, can we truly say that we have a Government by majority rule.

That desirable end can be readily accomplished, Mr. Speaker, by the prompt enactment into Federal law of the bill which I have introduced. It is brief in content and easily understood. It prescribes no qualifications for voters and, therefore, can not possibly be obnoxious to any State or section of the country. It merely provides that those electors in each State already otherwise qualified to vote for Senators and Representatives in Congress shall be given the longest possible period of time within which to register their names upon the voting lists prior to election day. The time prescribed in the bill is the period any time in the year of election and ending 30 days prior to election day. The 30-day period immediately preceding the election during which time the registration books would be closed I believe would afford ample time for the proper officials to print, correct, and canvass the voting lists in preparation for their use in the elections. The bill is not intended to operate as a restriction in any State where the law gives the voter a longer time to register and to make this clear, section 2 carefully provides against any such restriction, limitation, or abridgement. The passage of this bill can not possibly work harm, but, on the contrary, I am confident that it will be of positive benefit to hundreds and even thousands of citizens of my State who will by force of its provisions be saved their right to participate in the election of the Senators and Representatives of their country notwithstanding the antiquated law and constitution of their State.

H. R. 9068

A bill to provide for the registration of electors qualified to vote for Senators and Representatives in Congress

Be it enacted, etc., That where in any State it is required by law of electors qualified to vote for Senators and Representatives in Congress to register their names and other facts pertaining to their residence and citizenship as a prerequisite to the enrollment of their names on the official voting lists to be used at any election for said Senators and Representatives, it shall be sufficient therefor for such electors to so register with the proper local authority for that purpose any time 30 days prior to the day set for the election of said Senators and Representatives.

SEC. 2. The provisions of this act shall not be construed to limit or abridge in any way a longer period of time for such registration allowed or prescribed by the provisions of the statute of any State.

ADJOURNMENT

Mr. JEFFERS. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 4 o'clock and 59 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until Monday, February 15, 1932, at 12 o'clock noon.

VIEWS OF HON. WILLIAM G. M'ADOO ON TAXATION

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, I send to the desk a letter from Hon. William G. McAdoo relating to taxation matters, which I ask may be referred to the Committee on Finance and printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the letter was referred to the Committee on Finance and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

LOS ANGELES, CALIF., February 3, 1932.

MY DEAR SENATOR: Replying to your recent letter, I feel honored that you should want my views on taxation, and I am glad to submit a few suggestions without attempting to go into all phases of the problem.

I expressed the conviction some years ago that the policy of paying our war debt over a short term of years was unjust to the present generation, because it imposed upon it a larger part of the burden than it should be required to bear. I believe, of course, that the quicker the Nation gets out of debt the better; but in determining what is the reasonable period over which the war burden should be spread we should have regard to economic conditions and the ability of the taxpayers of this generation to carry the load. During the past 12 years a larger portion of the debt has been paid than should have been justly apportioned to the present generation. For this reason I think that we may with wisdom fund a considerable part of the Treasury deficit into long-time bonds and thereby reduce the amount of new taxation which the public will otherwise be forced to bear. This is particularly necessary in view of the exhausted condition of the country. Reports are so conflicting that I am unable to make a satisfactory estimate as to the probable Treasury deficit for the fiscal year 1932. I understand that it will amount to $2,000,000,000 or more. In any case, I should say that it would be sound and wise to fund 60 per cent of it into long-time obligations and to raise the remaining 40 per cent by taxation.

When it comes to the distribution of the new tax burden we naturally turn first to incomes.

Having regard to the present distressing conditions, I think it would be unwise to reduce existing exemptions, and I think, too, that it would be extremely hurtful to make the new income taxes retroactive to 1931. Manifestly, the surtaxes should be increased on large incomes, especially on those above $100,000, although it should be borne in mind that the heavier this tax the greater will be the inducement to owners of large incomes to escape it by investing in tax-exempt securities. Already there are more than $30,000,000,000 of tax-exempt bonds in the United States. The income from this vast amount of wealth is immune from all taxation except inheritance taxes. I have long been opposed to the practice of issuing tax-exempt bonds. Our Federal, State, and local governments have carried it to extremes. The courts have upheld the validity of these exemptions, and there is no excape from what has already been done. But the policy ought to be discontinued. It is unsound and uneconomic to enlarge this tax-exempt refuge and to further increase that privileged class which makes no contribution to the support of our Federal, State, and local governments. I mention this fact, not because it is altogether relevant to the subject of this letter but to indicate that the return from excessive surtaxes on large incomes is not, for the reasons stated, a safe reliance for greatly increased revenues.

In the field of excise taxes it is difficult to say where the burden may be placed with least distress to the masses of the people. Excise taxes are consumption taxes. If confined to luxuries, or so-called luxuries, they are not sufficiently productive, especially in hard times; nevertheless, we should get all the revenue obtainable from that source. Obviously, taxes should not be laid upon the necessaries of life. Gasoline is a case in point. Gasoline has become a necessity of modern life—to the farmer who operates his tractor to cultivate his field and his automobile to haul his produce to market; to the laboring man who must have a motor to carry him to and from his work; and to every class of our people to which the automobile is an indispensable accessory of present-day life. Already the various States have imposed large taxes on domestic gasoline, and it seems to me that it would be unwise for the Federal Government to invade this field and put new burdens on gasoline users. I think it would be better to lay a tax on imported crude and fuel oil and on imported gasoline. This would produce not only a substantial revenue but it would tend to revive the domestic oil industry in some of the most important States of the Union, all of which are now suffering from a flood of foreign oil importations, with resulting shutdowns of wells and enforced idleness of thousands of oil workers who, with their families, are suffering from actual want. Moreover, the reduction and, in many cases, the actual cessation of royalty payments to great numbers of farmers and others who own oil-bearing lands and the reduction or suspension of oil dividends have contributed in no small degree to the prevailing distress in large sections of the country.

It occurs to me—and I submit it merely as a suggestion—that it would be wise to impose, for the year 1932, a very heavy tax on passports with a special provision for reductions in cases where it can be shown to the satisfaction of the State Department that passports are required for necessary business purposes or to meet emergencies arising from illness or accidents. While the revenues from this source might not be great, the contribution to our domestic prosperity would be substantial if our citizens who now spend in European and other foreign countries vast sums of money on holiday tours would spend that money at home this year. It would stimulate American summer resorts and American trade in thousands of directions with marked benefit to the economic situation. I am sure that patriotic Americans are willing to cooperate by this means to help their country in this trying period.

I think, too, that a levy should be made on the initial offering of all foreign securities in the United States. The evidence developed by Senator JOHNSON in his recent investigation of foreign bonds sold in our markets will, doubtless, put an end to or greatly reduce such offerings for the present, but the time is opportune to establish the policy and it should have a salutary effect. This form of taxation is not without precedent in other countries.

We all read, from time to time, statements about the vast amount of money the Government is losing because of the prohibition laws. It is said that bootleggers are making a billion and a half dollars per annum from their illicit trade; that if the Government would legalize and tax the liquor business, this immense sum would flow into the coffers of the Treasury.

Without discussing the accuracy of these statements or the futility of the suggestion because of insuperable legal obstacles, or the merits or demerits of prohibition, I think that if the bootleggers are profiting each year to the extent of $1,500,000,000, or any other sum, through violation of the laws of the United States, it is the obvious duty of the Government to take the entire amount of such profits through taxation. It is a fundamental principle of law that no one shall be permitted to profit by his own crime. Bootlegging is a crime under the laws of the United States. The Government has the unquestioned power to destroy the illegal business by taxing all the profit out of it. If there is no profit, there will be no incentive to engage in the business, and there will be no money to corrupt officers of the law and to instigate murder and other crimes. If, in the new revenue bill, an income tax of 100 per cent should be laid upon all profits arising from any business, occupation, or operation conducted in violation of the antinarcotic laws and the prohibition laws, we might succeed in transferring to the Federal Treasury the income derived from those sources until they are dried up. Such a tax, combined with the inquisitorial power possessed by the Bureau of Internal Revenue, is one of the most effective weapons that could be employed to destroy the bootleggers and narcotic dealers.

It may not be possible to collect 100 per cent of the illegal income, but certainly the wholesalers—the crux of the problem, can be reached; and if they should be driven out of business, the small operator or retailer will find it difficult to ply his nefarious trade. Those who argue that the Government should not tax unlawful business, fail to realize that if incomes from illicit operations are exempted from or permitted to escape taxation while incomes from lawful operations are not, the criminal is rewarded and the honest man is punished.

I have not attempted to enter upon a full discussion of the tax problem. I submit these reflections merely for what they may be worth.

With warm regards, I am, cordially yours,

W. G. McADOO.

Hon. THOMAS J. WALSH,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

RELIEF OF UNEMPLOYMENT

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. President, I have on my desk a petition of the Wage Earners National Relief Association containing over 45,000 names. I want to submit the petition and I wish to have inserted in the RECORD in connection therewith a copy of the resolution covering the intent and purposes of the petition and also the letter transmitting it.

There being no objection, the petition was ordered to lie on the table and the resolution and letter of transmittal were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Resolution covering the intent and purposes

Whereas the unemployment situation has become of such magnitude that its severity is being felt in every city and hamlet throughout the United States, causing widespread suffering and privation, particularly among the wage earning and salaried people; and

Whereas the supporting heads of these families have been unable to obtain employment, through no fault of theirs, which would provide the necessary funds to support their dependents, therefore they have become the unwilling objects of private charity, which is reluctant as well as unable to cope with a situation of such magnitude; and

Whereas this appalling economic disaster and national tragedy called the depression is expected to continue throughout the coming winter, causing prolonged suffering, starvation, and want and producing a greater strain on the already depleted resources of institutions of charity; and

Whereas it now becomes necessary for national planning and action to be undertaken in the form of unemployment insurance to provide immediate relief and succor to those who have fallen the helpless victims of our existing economic order, and to prevent the reoccurrence of this national catastrophe in the future: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That in view of our belief in the sincerity and high degree of public responsibility manifested on many occasions by the President of the United States, and expressing confidence in the fairness and justice of our great lawmaking body, the Congress of the United States, and in cooperation with the efforts of its Members who are studying and planning unemployment-relief measures, this initiative petition by and for the wage earners and salaried people of the United States shall upon completion provide the vitally necessary public support for, and shall be presented with, a suitable bill to the Congress of the United States at Washington, D. C., demanding of that body such legislative action as shall, without further delay, provide for the immediate relief of the unemployed, thereby restoring peace and security to distressed millions, bringing about a new order of national responsibility and renewing absolute faith and confidence in the soundness, flexibility, and permanence of our form of government, thus insuring an improvement of business and stabilizing national economic conditions.

He also, from the same committee to which the above matter was referred, reported a resolution (S. Res. 166), which was ordered to be placed on the calendar, as follows:

"FIGHT OF HIGH FINANCE AGAINST PROHIBITION"

Mr. HATFIELD. Mr. President, I ask leave to have published in the RECORD a speech delivered by the senior Senator from Iowa [Mr. BROOKHART] over the National Broadcasting System, at Washington, D. C., on the 13th instant, under the auspices of the Radio Education Committee.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Upton Sinclair has written a very attractive novel under title of The Wet Parade. It is the truthfulness of his picture that gives it the greatest power. He has torn off a mask from every face of the antiprohibition fight. In its true face it is a deceptive, cowardly, and selfish picture.

To-night I want to point out to you some of the insidious and camouflaged activities of high finance in its assault upon prohibition. The first national organization was called the Association Against Prohibition. This association was set up by a small number of big financial men who are heavy income-tax payers into the Treasury of the United States because they are heavy profiteers upon the labor and earnings of the people of the United States. They were, in fact, an association of tax dodgers looking for an opportunity to transfer their taxes to the backs of the laboring people and the common people of the country by the nullification of the eighteenth amendment and the legalizing of beverages of low alcoholic content. They cared nothing for the moral devastation to be wrought by such a course and nothing for the economic cruelty to women and children that would follow its adoption. Their selfish purpose was to reduce their taxes, increase their ruthless profits, and establish an economic autocracy over our Government. Every pronouncement of this financial association refers to this tax question in some form. The latest letter received by me, dated February 6 of this year, points out that 10 States have demanded the repeal of the eighteenth amendment; that they represent only 29.42 per cent of our population, but they pay 63.69 per cent of the individual income taxes of the United States. This insidious statement neglects to tell you that the financial crowd in these same States are levying a tax upon the people of the whole country in the form of excess profits of a good deal more than 63.69 per cent. In fact, they are levying these extortionate profits with such monopolistic power that 92 per cent in number of American business enterprises ultimately fail. And it is therefore evident that high finance in these States is not now and never has paid anything like its just share of the income taxes.

An outgrowth of this organization is another association of women for so-called prohibition reform. This association is not for reform at all. It is against reform. Its whole purpose is to supplement the tax dodgers of the Association Against Prohibition in its efforts to tax the laboring people of the country who drink beer instead of the big incomes of the profits of monopoly.

We next find another organization which calls itself "The Crusaders." Again this is a camouflaged title. They adopt a religious name for an irreligious purpose. Under this mask they not only supplement the arguments of the tax dodgers but they dive deep into economics and insist that the return of intoxicating liquor would restore prosperity. Again there is a deep and sinister purpose in this argument. We have dropped down into the biggest depression in our time. This catastrophe of economic disaster has been brought upon the country by this same financial crowd of extortionate profiteers through their power of monopoly. They built bubbles of inflation, watered stocks, and inflated bonds, induced the public to invest their savings in these mythical values, and now since the bubble has burst they would have the public enter the fight over prohibition and forget the criminal excesses of this same financial crowd.

The latest and perhaps the most contemptible exploit of this financial campaign is the publication of a fake newspaper in Philadelphia under the title, Herald of Good Times. In a big, full-page headline this paper declares, "Hoover demands prohibition repeal," and in another headline it says, "Fess resigns on eve of Hoover message." In smaller type, purposely less noticeable, it says, "All imaginary—more's the pity." This deceptive paper was mailed to all Members of Congress, accompanied by a letter under heading "Republican Citizens' Committee Against National Prohibition," signed by Raymond Pitcairn. This letter is perhaps the most insolent and traitorous document that has been published, and quoting the Wall Street Journal, it advocates revolt and rebellion in the following language:

"When on the night of July 14, 1789, the Duc de Liancourt reported to King Louis that the Bastille had fallen to the assaults of the people, the King cried, 'Why, this is a revolt.' 'No, sire,' was the reply, 'it is a revolution.' People have been revolting against our prohibition laws; the elections show the revolt is changing to revolution before which this legislative tyranny must fall."

The first revolt and rebellion we ever had in this country was in this same State of Pennsylvania, and known in history as the whisky rebellion, and was put down by President Washington. And if this insolent and autocratic Wall Street crowd want to promote another alcoholic rebellion it, too, will be put down, and the taxes on the financial crowd will be raised instead of lowered to pay the bill.

In spite of all of this froth and foam of the financial crowd against the eighteenth amendment and the Volstead Act, the result is not at all disheartening to the prohibitionists. A test was brought to the United States Senate upon a question of a referendum, and the wets were only able to muster 15 votes against 55. There is no danger to the prohibition cause except the insidious power of money. This power is able to control the vast majority of the public press. If it is able to, it puts its decoy ducks even in some of the great labor organizations; but it has wholly failed to impress the moral sense of the country. In spite of its efforts at nullification, conditions are greatly improved over the old saloon days, even in the great wet cities of the country.

I do not want to encourage the temperance organizations of the United States to be indifferent to this violent agitation. On the other hand, I want them to awaken and meet every argument against the advance of prohibition and law enforcement. If properly presented to the people of the country, they will understand that all the issues presented by the wet crowd are in bad faith and without any rational purpose. Before the eighteenth amendment can be changed or modified in any way the proposition must be submitted by a two-thirds vote of both Houses of Congress.

At this time, instead of being two-thirds in favor of such change the House of Representatives is two-thirds against it and the Senate is three-fourths against it. After such amendment or change should be submitted it must then be ratified by three-fourths of the States, or 36 in number, before it would become effective. There are two methods of ratification, one by a vote of the legislatures of the various States and the other by a convention of delegates elected for that purpose. Congress has the power under the Constitution to submit either method of ratification.

The wet crowd, having been beaten in 46 of the 48 legislatures upon the ratification of the eighteenth amendment itself, now demand a submission to conventions, which they fallaciously call a referendum. There is no provision in the Constitution for a referendum upon any question. The financial crowd that demand a referendum upon prohibition are against referendums upon any economic question. They single out prohibition for a referendum as a last forlorn hope, because all constitutional methods have failed when invoked against it. This position is entirely unfair as well as unlawful. However, the wet crowd camouflage and cover up the idea of a referendum with a demand for the convention method of ratification. With their financial means of corruption they feel they could buy enough delegates in these conventions to secure a ratification. Such a submission would open up the greatest orgy of corruption in the history of our country, and it is the financial crowd that has both the desire and power of corruption.

The fight is over now so far as the Constitution and the law is concerned. There is no vital question left except that of enforcement, and enforcement is improving. If the temperance forces of the country will now point their guns at this financial crowd hiding behind newspapers and other organizations, the agitation itself will soon be over and the eighteenth amendment will be enforced in all the States of the Union as reasonably in proportion as other laws.

UNVEILING OF TABLET TO LATE SENATOR GREENE

Mr. DALE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an account of the unveiling of a memorial tablet to the late Senator Frank L. Greene, of Vermont, in the statehouse at Montpelier, Vt.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The account is as follows:

[From the Burlington Free Press and Times, February 11, 1932]

UNVEIL TABLET IN MEMORY OF SENATOR FRANK L. GREENE AT STATEHOUSE, MONTPELIER—PRESENTED BY FORMER GOV. E. C. SMITH AND RECEIVED FOR STATE BY GOVERNOR WILSON—MANY ST. ALBANS PEOPLE ATTEND

MONTPELIER, February 10.—A tablet to the memory of Frank L. Greene, United States Senator and well-known and much-loved son of Vermont, was unveiled at the statehouse this afternoon in the presence of a large number of his former fellow citizens of St. Albans, who made the trip to the State capital in a special car. It was presented by former Gov. E. C. Smith, of St. Albans, and received on behalf of the State by Gov. Stanley C. Wilson.

The large bronze tablet bears at the top a bas-relief portrait of the late Senator and beneath is the inscription:

"To Frank Lester Greene, 1870–1930, newsboy, stenographer, editor, captain in Spanish War, Representative in Congress, 1912 to 1923, United States Senator, 1923 to 1930. This tablet is here placed in affectionate remembrance by his friends and neighbors throughout the State of Vermont."

It was unveiled by two of Senator Greene's grandchildren, Mary Elizabeth Greene, daughter of Capt. and Mrs. Richard L. Greene, and Betty Alexander, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Harris W. Alexander, of St. Albans. Stephen S. Cushing, of St. Albans, acted as master of ceremonies.

PRESENTATION

In presenting the memorial, the gift of Frank Greene's many friends from all parts of the State, Mr. Smith said:

"My friends and neighbors, in assembling here to present to the State of Vermont this memorial to Frank Greene, it seems to me almost like reciting a twice-told tale to offer any eulogy on his life to you, his friends and neighbors, who are gathered here in honor of his memory and who knew him during all the years of his life quite as well and as intimately as I did. You knew the story of his life and his struggles and his triumphs through an intimacy with him that can not be broadened or emphasized by any words of mine. You knew him as a boy when he was earning his pennies to aid in the support of his family. You knew him as he developed his years and his ability and his resources, when his mind and capability were expanded and when he came to manhood and assumed its responsibilities. You watched and wondered at the sparkle and scintillation of his wit and at the brilliant, wonderful development of his youthful hopefulness and optimism, springing up as it did out of a native ability which shone through the clouds of adversity that shadowed all the years of his youth and early manhood. You knew also full well how he triumphed and stepped up from one responsibility to each higher one, and you shared with him, as I did, the brilliant glint of his intelligence that shone from the waves and surface of the whole stream of his life like the dancing sunlight on a woodland river flowing through a forest of brilliant colors.

"All this you knew and shared and enjoyed and have good reason to bless yourselves and him that you were permitted to join in the life of such a hopeful, buoyant nature. To this side of Frank Greene's life I can add nothing to what each one of you shared and enjoyed. You and each of you will cherish your own portion of your association with his daily life, as well as your own fair recollection of what he meant to you, and to each of you. Upon the walls of your memory there hang priceless recollections of his loyalty, of his wit, and of his manly affection.

"All these memories are delightful and within the scope of your personal association with him, but with your vision of them, comes the sober thought that there was indeed much more to Frank Greene than a superficial brilliancy. Everybody will acknowledge after reflection that there was beyond all these qualifications, and above them all, something greater and stronger, something that in every crisis of his life lifted him above the assaults of adversity, so that when each crisis had passed he was left stronger and greater. It was something that steadied him and strengthened him and overcame misfortunes that threatened his existence, something that carried him to a higher and still higher plane of life. So in addition to all that we knew intimately about him, there is also this latter quality which we commemorate in this tablet. This quality was the sterling character of the boy and of the man. It was the elemental in his soul. It was founded on an eternal sense of right which possessed his being and controlled his actions and its unerring grasp upon his life carried him triumphantly from newsboy to reporter, to editor, to a command of men in war, to Representative of his State at Washington, to a seat in the Senate of the United States. It is this righteous element of his character that really brings us here to place on the walls of this House this memorial of his life. It will remain as a shining example to those who come hereafter.

"In this spirit, your excellency, we turn over to the State of Vermont the ownership and custody of this tablet, in the belief that it will be received and held by the State as a fitting tribute to a worthy son, who by his life and work and record justly earned the name and the fame of a true Vermonter."

GOVERNOR WILSON SPEAKS

Governor Wilson, in reply, said:

"In behalf of the State of Vermont I accept this tablet to be preserved here in our statehouse as a memorial to Frank L. Greene, one of Vermont's distinguished sons.

"No man was ever more loyal to Vermont than was he. No man ever gave his State more whole-hearted, able, and honest service.

"His life history is the kind of a record that gives us renewed faith in the permanence of our institutions, and the good, sound judgment of our people. The boy of to-day may read it and learn that opportunity lies open to him here in Vermont if he only has the ability to grasp it and the character to sustain his hold.

"Frank Greene was a typical Vermonter, whose success was measured not so much by his accomplishments in his profession, not so much by the height to which he climbed in public office, but especially by the esteem, the confidence, and the love of all who knew him.

"It is fitting that here in the capitol of the State he loved, through the efforts of his friends and neighbors, shall be placed this tablet to perpetuate the memory of Frank L. Greene, the editor, the soldier, the United States Senator, but above all the real man all loved and whose memory we revere."

REGULATION OF SECURITY ISSUES

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD several editorials published in the Atlanta (Ga.) Constitution relating to the Federal regulation of seurities of corporations.

There being no objection, the editorials were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE PILLAGE OF THE CONSUMER AND THE INNOCENT INVESTOR

Fostered by three Republican administrations and unhampered by Federal restraint, the high financing which in the past 10 years blossomed into overcapitalization and came to fruit in profit-grabbing holding companies is in a fair way to feel the pruning knife when Congress meets in December.

Often adversely criticized, the holding-company scheme of high financing is now under a withering fire leveled against it by many Democrats and a number of Republicans; and if the trend toward establishing Federal control is as strong as the present current of public opinion indicates, Congress will act surely and swiftly to put an end to a scheme which has been disastrous in its results and remains sinister in its tendencies. Beyond all doubt, this modern financial Frankenstein, rampant in its ruthlessness during the past 10 years, has contributed vastly to bringing about present conditions in America's banking, commerce, and industry.

Senator DAVID I. WALSH, of Massachusetts, in a speech delivered in the Senate last March referred to high financing and its malignant excrescences of holding companies and watered stock as "an issue more immediately important than prohibition." After asserting that the political responsibility of subnormal business conditions should be fixed, Senator WALSH said he believed the depression, with its accompanying widespread unemployment and other economic troubles which hamper readjustment, to be "due largely to financial exploitation and stock manipulations which have taken place in this country since the war."

And he added this scorching indictment of the predatory activities which were the beneficiaries of the aid and comfort of three complacent Republican administrations:

"Mergers, consolidations, refinancing schemes, changes in financial structures, rights, and warrants, all causing overcapitalization, stock watering and a highly inflated condition of security prices are responsible in large measure for our present economic breakdown.

"These false and artificially created values gave a wrong and false impression of the real status of business, and that false impression was hailed as "prosperity," when, in fact, we now know that what we had was an unsound, if not a dishonest, inflation of capitalization in industry and finance.

"To speak plainly, it was gambling, and the false showing made by gambling. We are to-day the victims of an orgy of gambling with money, securities, businesses, and industries that is without parallel in the history of the world."

The results of the past decade of high financing—a decade which Senator WALSH calls an epoch of mergers and financial exploitation without check, hindrance, or restraint—has been both nefarious and ruinous. Nor is the Massachusetts Senator overstating when he refers to "this epoch of the triumph of greed and selfishness, this era of complete subservience to materialism," and brands it as the natural and inevitable result of "a philosophy and a political leadership dominated by the selfishness of the powerful few who control the vast mergers of the wealth of the country," in short, the Republican Party, which in 10 years has passed from political debauchery to tight-lipped complacency and now is the abject slave of tariff pirates and moneyed interests.

Courageous and clear is Senator WALSH in his charge that this high financing, with corporations merged and finally swallowed by a holding company; this "redoubling of the capitalization of our industries and our financial structures, which is alleged to have run into fifty billions," is responsible "for the terrible decline in values, the widespread business depression and the general unemployment."

This method of working out the mergers and organizing holding companies has been developed into a fine art by large groups of investment bankers since the war. These investment bankers, asserts Senator WALSH, "have been buying prosperous industries, consolidating them, inflating the capital, and then dumping the stocks on the public and destroying the industry." Indeed, reckless mishandling of financial power is one of the causes of the depression in New England, where, according to Senator WALSH, fine industries, 75 to 100 years old, with a national reputation, known in every financial institution in the world as solid and substantial, "have been looted, consolidated, and reconsolidated, so that to-day they have a capitalization that makes it impossible to produce at a going price the products which they have been manufacturing."

In Senator WALSH's own community there is one industry which in the past 15 years has gone through five consolidations. In the process of merging, the physical valuations of the consolidated industries were inflated from $15,000,000 to $40,000,000. Before the crash came, the bottom of the stock in the consolidated industries dropped out, and among those who lost much—in some cases their all—were professional men, school-teachers, and widows, who had bought the certificates of stock in the parent industries, which were most prosperous and had a world-wide reputation.

These victims of consolidations and reconsolidations and holding companies, says Senator WALSH, "could not take the time to study and investigate the manipulations and the changes in the financial structure that were with rapidity carried on, and which resulted in the securities becoming practically worthless." Obviously, these uninformed purchasers of high-financed stock could not keep track of the manipulations which, free from Federal control, were not confined to a charted financial path. Even seasoned stock traders are often baffled, and only a few days ago a report by a committee of the Investment Bankers' Association of America stated that "the different levels of securities that the public is asked to buy, the impossibilities in not a few instances of following their relative liens or obligations, the practical impossibility of pursuing them to ultimate account and settlements, result in marked uncertainty about them. * * * Conspicuous holding companies are now simple or are in process of becoming so, while unfortunately others are apparently oblivious of the need."

Fortunately there are many Congressmen, both Democratic and Republican, who are not oblivious to the need of simplifying the high-financing schemes which have either mulcted the public or forced up prices beyond a decently profitable basis and put a burden on the public in order that profits may be squeezed out of watered and rediluted stocks. There are also governors who are aware of the needs to protect the public, and who realize that not the State, but the Federal Government must pass the necessary legislation and vigorously enforce it.

Both Governor Roosevelt and Governor Pinchot have been making intensive studies of this holding-company scheme, and their views are in line with those of Senator WALSH, particularly in the public-utilities situation, which has been so notoriously overdone it is now reacting on the original companies which were lured or forced into consolidation.

Unquestionably too little public attention has been given to the part which holding companies, escaping both State and Federal regulation, have had in creating an artificial market. That is the opinion of Gov. Gifford Pinchot, of Pennsylvania, who, like Governor Roosevelt, has been in close contact with this menacing public-utilities situation. Governor Pinchot scoffs at the idea that the concentration of utilities amounted, as has been claimed, to a kind of painless dentistry which took the teeth out of the law without harmful effect, and he adds: "Ask the people who bought 200 utility stocks that are now down to 20."

It is Governor Pinchot's contention that the result of these mergers, "engineered by holding companies outside of State control and not within Federal control, was to help largely in creating a stock-market level which many of our largest business leaders are now freely describing as 'crazy.' For years when there was a slight slump, a new utility merger would again lead the list upward." For the want of Federal legislation, these uncontrolled holding companies have, according to Governor Pinchot, carried on speculative and riotous stock jobbing. This has not only hurt the investor, but "it has prevented operating utility managers from reducing rates, even if they wanted to, to the extent which the engineering advances in the industry warranted."

How shall the problem of the holding company be handled? Certainly it is beyond the reach of the State, or even of groups of States under compact, as Mr. Pinchot says. There are those who are opposed to Federal control—particularly do the holding companies object.

Here are Governor Pinchot's views on this point:

"We are told that Federal regulation will impair State regulation. What will it impair? Certainly not the control of the holding companies, for the States have none now. And yet what the holding companies do in frenzied finance is the essence of what needs to be stopped or controlled in the utilities field to-day."

The problem is one for Federal control, and it is the undebatable duty of the approaching Congress to pass regulatory legislation for two reasons—first, to protect the consumer; and, next, to protect the innocent investor. And there is no need for the Democrats to wait until 1932 for a platform pronouncement—the Democratic Party, in convention assembled in 1924, in a plank which to-day seems both a prophecy and a warning, but which is also no less than a mandate, said:

"We favor the immediate passage of such legislation as may be necessary to enable the States efficiently to enforce their laws relating to the gradual financial strangling of innocent investors, workers, and consumers, caused by the indiscriminate promotion, refinancing, and reorganizing of corporations on an insane basis, resulting already in the undermining and collapse of many railroads, public-service, and industrial corporations, manifesting itself in unemployment, irreparable loss and waste, and which constitute a serious menace to the stability of our economic system."

The arguments advanced by Senator WALSH, Governor Pinchot, and Governor Roosevelt, as well as the enunciated principles of Democracy, call for action. The greed of the Republican bosses has kept them silent and inactive.

The Democrats, free from predatory control, can offer no excuse if they fail to act promptly in behalf of the public.

NOW UP TO CONGRESS!

From Washington during the past week came the news that the editorial in the Constitution of last Sunday on the plight of the consumer and the innocent investor, victims of pillage by stock-jobbing mergers, has stirred congressional circles not merely to laudatory comment but to unequivocal pledges of action at the approaching session.

Among those who have expressed their commendation of the Constitution's call for legislative action that will place holding companies and other forms of "high financing" under Federal control are—

Senator PETER NORBECK, chairman of the Senate Committee on Banking and Currency.

Senator JAMES COUZENS, chairman of the Senate Interstate Commerce Committee.

Senator SMITH W. BROOKHART.

Senator GEORGE MCGILL.

Senator ARTHUR CAPPER.

Senator JOHN J. BLAINE.

Senator CORDELL HULL.

Senator NORBECK and Senator COUZENS have been making a comprehensive and an intensive study of the chaotic conditions brought on by the unrestrained flood of consolidations, pyramided mergers, holding companies, and watered stock, which have swept away the levees of sound and logical business procedure. Interviews with these two Senators, along with statements by Senators BLAINE and MCGILL, are printed in the news columns of the Constitution this morning. Senator NORBECK, after commending the Constitution's editorial, calls for action, asserts the Banking and Currency Committee's subcommittee, of which Senator GLASS is chairman, will go thoroughly into the vexing and menacing problem of labyrinthine stock manipulations. It is not to be doubted, as Senator NORBECK suggests, that the committee will make definite recommendations for a wholesome improvement in the present situation. There is, as the Constitution pointed out and Senator NORBECK now emphasizes, something unquestionably wrong with our financial structure, and he makes the comforting assertion that an effort will be made to uncover the weakness.

And by way of indicating the direction in which a lack of caution and conservatism and a departure from sound business methods are leading financiers, Senator NORBECK recalls that the testimony of Charles E. Mitchell, chairman of the board of National City Bank, of New York, before the subcommittee of the Senate's Banking and Currency committee "showed that large banks with their affiliates gambled in stocks on the New York Stock Exchange."

It is also indicated that holding companies and "racketeering" in stocks and bonds will have their methods bared by the NORBECK-GLASS committee.

Senator COUZENS, whose interview is also printed in the news columns of this issue, is in hearty accord with the Constitution's belief that there should be Federal regulation of "high financing" and its attendant evils of holding companies and watered stock. The Senator from Michigan, who is a man both of wealth and large business experience, has in the past warned the financial interests of the country they were treading on dangerous ground in their stock-manipulation schemes. Senator COUZENS now asserts that "the false and artificially created values built up in the precrash era are the fundamental causes of present-day distress." This is precisely the point made by the Constitution in its editorial of Sunday, and the same conclusion was reached some time ago by Senator DAVID I. WALSH, Gov. Gifford Pinchot, and Gov. Franklin D. Roosevelt.

That the lack of Federal control has enabled holding companies to carry on speculative and riotous stockjobbing is obvious. Governor Pinchot in a recent speech stated that the uncontrolled holding companies have not only brought losses to investors but "prevented operating utility managers from reducing rates to the extent which the engineering advances in the industry warranted." On the same line, Senator COUZENS stated to the Constitution's Washington correspondent that because of the absence of Federal control interstate holding and management companies squeeze the consumer, and pictured one of the processes, as follows: "Operating utilities in the mere process of padding operating expenses through supply contracts with 'affiliated' companies are able to charge rates with which, on paper, they may be losing money, but which in fact reflect a net profit in the corporate pocket of the parent concern." It might well be added that in times of economic dislocation the holding companies "bear down" on the operating companies and force them to make a drive to pay the interest on watered stock; when the limit of high-pressure salesmanship is reached employees are discharged and salaries cut. The sins of the holding company are thus transferred to the operating group, which must meet adverse local criticism in a situation out of their control.

Senator WALSH of Massachusetts has not only discussed the holding companies' methods, but in his recent speech on the subject gave an interesting example of the steps leading to consolidation and watered stock, how investment bankers make fortunes out of unsuspecting investors and open the road to the destruction of once profitable properties.

In response to a fellow Senator's query concerning consolidations, Senator WALSH made the following straightforward and illuminating reply:

"Why do promoters offer $1,000,000 each for two plants worth $500,000 apiece?

"Is it not done by the banker to recapitalize them for $3,000,000 or $4,000,000, and thus put two or three million dollars in his pocket?

"That is what has been going on in industry and business in the last 10 years. That is what has made smokeless chimneys, deserted villages, empty homes in the land.

"It is a terrible story of wreck and ruin that cries to Heaven for vengeance."

Senator WALSH's picture of "high financing" and its results is not overdrawn.

One instance is enough to illustrate the seriousness of the evil. The Constitution has in mind a railroad corporation which has an outstanding bond issue of hundreds of millions of dollars and has not retired a bond in 70 years.

The stock of this company has been watered, rewatered, and drenched. Now the innocent investor holds the bag, for the company announces that it can not pay a dividend this year. It is all it can do to meet the interest on its bonds.

In the approaching Congress the House of Representatives will be Democratic. The opportunity to set the Nation's financial house in order is at hand.

It is futile to talk about appointing "investigating" committees, The fact are known, and have been known for too many years.

If the Republicans discover they must await a mandate from their next party convention, there is no such excuse for the Democrats. Seven years ago the Democratic Party nailed to its platform a plank which demanded the legislation necessary to put an end "to the gradual financial strangling of innocent investors, workers, and consumers caused by the indiscriminate promotion, refinancing, and reorganizing of corporations on an insane basis, resulting already in the undermining and collapse of many railroads, public-service, and industrial corporations, manifesting itself in unemployment, irreparable loss, and waste, and which constitute a serious menace to the stability of our economic system."

Seven years ago the Democratic Party was aware of the unhealthy financial conditions which, then threatening disaster, two years later brought it about.

Seven years ago!

And in the seven years that followed the Republican Party, reeking with every form of scandal, expressed itself through the platitudes of a Coolidge pledging perpetual prosperity in the face of approaching economic upheaval and the parrotings of a Hoover prophesying the passing of poverty in the midst of a calamity accentuated by Republican complacency and inefficiency.

Republicans may continue their program of blind inanition, but Democracy, courageous and clear visioned, can conjure up no excuse for failing to fulfill its destiny of duty to the people.

HOLDING-COMPANY EVILS

Senator WILLIAM E. BORAH is 1 of 11 Members of the Senate who have heartily commended the proposal of the Constitution that the Federal Government should undertake to regulate holding companies and put an end to the rampant speculative stock jobbing perpetrated by this modern method of profit grabbing. In previous editorials relating to the mulcting of consumers and the pillaging of investors through the menacing holding-company scheme, emphasis was placed on a condition which has served to direct attention to stock-jobbing mergers. This reference is to the fashion in which holding companies crush the last penny of profits out of operating companies, and thus force the more or less localized victims of the merger into an equivocal position.

In his statement, printed in the news columns, Senator BORAH is forthright in his condemnation of what he calls "the sinister influence of and the capacity for evil of these holding companies." He mentions one example which was cited by the Federal Trade Commission—the case of a top holding of $1,000,000 which controlled $370,000,000 of operating capital. Another instance he mentions is that of a $100,000 holding company which controls a corporation the bonds and stock of which total more than $4,750,000. There is "literally no end to the concentration of wealth and the power of wealth under such a system if left uncontrolled by law," says Senator BORAH, and adds: "The Constitution has brought forward one of the most important problems with which we have to deal. Congress ought not to delay legislation on the subject."

Senator DAVID I. WALSH, of Massachusetts, in a speech last spring gave interesting examples of the disastrous merger methods of holding companies based on watered stock and how investment brokers make fortunes out of unsuspecting investors and open the way to the destruction of once profitable properties. On this point Senator BORAH asserts that under the system as fathered by "high finance" there are almost unlimited opportunities "for manipulations and for increasing the profits of the controlling concerns without considering the interests of other security holders and investors and the consuming public." And then, with that frankness which has drawn the admiration of many not fully in accord with his policies, Senator BORAH, referring to the holding-company scheme, says: "It is a legalized system of exploitation, amounting in some instances to brigandage."

In line with the views of Senator BORAH are those of Senator HOWELL, of Nebraska, whose statement was printed in the Constitution of Saturday. The Nebraskan cited a specific example of holding-company pyramiding which enabled the top organization to squeeze out dividends ranging from 48 per cent in 1924 to 212 per cent profit in 1930. Senator HOWELL asserted that the holding company is "absolutely unnecessary to properly conduct any form of business." He is aligned with those who intend to attempt to find legislative means for dehydrating watered stock and controlling the reckless refinancing methods of the larger corporate interests.

Senator GEORGE and the two Senators from Alabama have expressed their awareness of the need to investigate fully the menacing activities of holding companies and devise a method of Federal control which draws the claws of these financial monstrosities. Senator GEORGE in an interview printed a few days ago asserted that the postwar period witnessed "the formation of mergers and consolidations in industry and finance upon a scale hitherto undreamed of," and added:

"This spirit of speculation held undisputed sway. Overcapitalization of business, rotten and legitimate alike, occurred on an extended scale.

"Legitimate industry, built upon the foundation of personal integrity, was exploited by stockbrokers and gamblers—the people were in large numbers their victims."

Senator BLACK, of Alabama, believes "the holding company has materially aided in concentrating the wealth in a few hands," and that during the past decade "too many corporations have been organized to flim-flam the public on stock issues." He is also of the opinion, which he expresses without equivocation, that "overcapitalization is simply a method of fleecing the public, because dividends can not be paid on watered stock."

Senator BANKHEAD, of Alabama, believes that "a nation-wide 'skin game' in stock jobbing has been worked on the American people for years," and adds:

"A thorough investigation of the whole situation relative to high finance, stock juggling, overcapitalization, and profit grabbing should be made by a suitable committee of the Senate, and upon completion of the investigation no time should be lost in enacting regulatory legislation."

Senator DILL, of Washington, brands the holding-company-promotion racket in this country as "one of the most astounding monetary evils of modern times." He asserts that holding companies are not only absolutely unnecessary but that they are responsible for "a hybrid business racket with no foundation or recognition in law," and expresses the opinion that "the Constitution has touched the sore spot of the present business stagnation."

As for investigating the destructive holding company and watered stock situation, the facts are known, asserts Senator DILL. He shows that the Federal Trade Commission has already developed a wealth of information concerning stock promotions and consolidations.

"What we need now is action more than investigation," asserts Senator DILL.

That is the belief of the Constitution. The facts are available. The Democratic Party, in convention assembled, has denounced holding companies, overcapitalization, and stock jobbing.

At hand is the session of Congress. It brings to Democracy an opportunity to justify itself as the party of the people. Too long have they been the victims of a predatory and uncontrolled system of financial rackets. Federal action is the antidote for the pernicious speculative schemes which have engulfed alike consumer and investor.

DEMANDS FEDERAL CONTROL

From the amount of discussion aroused and the general commendation received by the Constitution's call for Federal regulation of holding companies, refinancing, and consolidations, it is obvious there is real need for action that will curb the evils of the rampant "high financing" schemes which have been evolved in the past decade.

In the statement indorsing the Constitution's editorials on the necessity for Government control of holding companies and similar organized mergers, Senator BANKHEAD asserted that in his judgment "so-called holding companies can be made all right, but they are not all right to-day." He added that "with the protection of adequate 'blue sky' laws there is no reason why holding companies can not be made servants of the people instead of their enemies. * * * If Congress does not act the people themselves are going to act."

The Constitution agrees with Senator BANKHEAD's assertion that "so-called holding companies can be made all right," provided, always, that the plan gives consideration to the innocent investor.

All holding companies are not of that type which has mulcted millions and millions of dollars from the trusting and unwary investor.

But the fact that there are holding companies which have not followed the path of those which have drawn the fire of many Members of Congress is no argument against the Constitution's position that all holding companies should be placed under Federal regulation. As a matter of fact, organizations which have not failed in their trust to investor and consumer should welcome investigation and regulation. For when the Government acts to prevent the "milking" of industries or utilities by pyramiding until value of its securities reach the vanishing point, those mergers which have been effected in good faith and are based on sound economics will have nothing to fear. And unless and until Federal control is established over interstate transactions of these holding and merger offerings the investor will be wary of every form of corporate security.

Congressmen who have commended the Constitution's attitude on the need for Federal regulation of "high finance" are men who have either studied carefully this amazing and menacing condition or have been in a position where their contact has enabled them to express sound opinions and give warnings that should be heeded. Among the number of such men is Senator M. M. LOGAN, Democrat, of Kentucky. He has been attorney general of his State, chief justice of the State court of appeals, and chairman of the State tax commission. As attorney general, he helped frame a number of laws in Kentucky looking to the safeguarding of the public against stock racketeering. Further, as he stated in an interview in which he applauded the Constitution's call for Federal action, Senator LOGAN has been instrumental in organizing industrial companies and is aware of the dangers accompanying mergers and the formation of holding companies.

Senator LOGAN "does not ordinarily favor the creation of a new commission," but asserts that "if a new one is needed to curb or regulate the stock 'racket.' I will lend it my support." The Kentucky constitution has a provision to prevent the issue of company stock beyond the actual and ascertainable value of the stock, but this has failed to prevent interstate stock dealings which follow in the wake of mergers and holding companies.

"All the evils of consolidations, reconsolidations, and holding companies outlined by the Constitution do exist," asserts Senator LOGAN, and he believes, as does the Constitution, that "the problem is one for Federal solution." Holding companies and mergers which are not tainted by overexploitation of stock values and milking of subsidiaries have nothing to fear from Government regulation.

Others will find that the end of their path to illegal profits and pillaged investors has been reached.

HOLDING-COMPANY MAGIC

Indications that action will be taken by Congress to put holding companies under Federal control are increasing. None questions that the Democratic Party stands for Government regulations of these superholding companies, and recent statements made by leaders of both parties give assurance that a move will be made at this session to curb the pillaging of the consumer and the innocent investor. And if further evidence as to the need of Federal regulation were required, that is furnished by the investigation of the manipulations resorted to by the North American Light & Power Co., which started in Maine, dragged its length several times across Delaware, and is now operating in the Middle West as an Insull property.

Holding-company merger magic makes Houdini's tricks seem very ordinary, since everyone is aware the magician must put something—a rabbit or what not—into the hat before he takes it out. The real similarity of the two examples of legerdemain is that the public doesn't know how the rabbit gets into the hat or how the holding company gets the smaller, if inflated, corporation into its maw. Perhaps the evidence given during the past few days before the Federal Trade Commission, which is referred to in the following paragraph, will shed some light on the mystic methods of holding companies.

Testifying last week before the Federal Trade Commission, Examiner Kenneth A. Miller asserted that the North American Light & Power Co. was originally known as the North American Light & Power Corporation and its birthplace was Maine. It is interesting, fascinating, to trace the tortuous twistings and windings of this organization, growing in size, changing its name, and adding millions to its book values in order that its charges to the ultimate consumer could be increased.

First comes the Maine corporation. Its assets and liabilities were transferred to the Universal Light & Power Co., a Delaware corporation, organized, not to help the consumer or the innocent investor, but solely, simply, and selfishly to take over the Maine company. And why? In order that the latter company, in conjunction with a specially organized Delaware corporation, could be merged with North American Light & Power Co., of Delaware, which, strangely enough, was a subsidiary of the Maine corporation.

The situation seems to be getting somewhat complex, but the fog of consolidation and reconsolidation grows thicker. Now comes a fourth company, the National Light & Power Co., of Delaware, which was organized to get up cash to carry out the merger of the three other companies. Then this last-named company disappears. The North American Light & Power Corporation of Maine disappears. The two Delaware companies become the North American Light & Power Co. Apparently, a Maine corporation and three Delaware corporations have been merged, but that is not the case. According to Examiner Miller, what really happened was the merger of two Delaware companies.

Evidence before the Federal Trade Commission Wednesday was to the effect that the North American Light & Power Corporation of Maine had appreciated its investments more than $23,000,000—from $1,250,000 to $24,430,434. Of this increase $16,000,000 was the result of appreciation of investments largely on the basis of engineering appraisals, while $8,000,000 was added by resolution of the board of directors. It is as simple as that.

As amazing as the foregoing inflation of values by the Maine company seems, it is merely an incident compared to the story of the growth of the North American Light & Power Co., which at present serves electricity to 350,000 customers and natural or manufactured gas to 163,000 customers, besides supplying street railway and bus service and heat and water in a territory containing an aggregate population of 1,600,000 in Illinois, Iowa, Kansas, and Missouri. The fixed capital and investments of this giant utilities holding company have grown from $22,027,000 in 1923 to $308,602,000 at the end of 1930, and its net earnings have increased from $8,890,000 in 1924 to $18,350,000 in 1930, a gain of 106.4 per cent in that 7-year period. Among the activities of this holding company about 1927 and later were investing in gas field leases in Kansas and Texas and organizing the Kansas Pipe Line & Gas Co., the McPherson Gas Co., and the McPherson Oil & Gas Co. Meanwhile, the holding company had acquired 38 municipal properties.

But let us get back to the Maine company, which was the inspiration—or victim—of the holding company which now has its habitat in the Middle West. As has been said, the Maine company was swallowed by the Universal Light & Power Co. of Delaware, which was merged with the North American Light & Power Co. of Delaware; and later a special company to furnish additional cash capital, the National Light & Power Co., was organized. Among the holders of capital stock in the Universal Light & Power Co. and the National Light & Power Co. were Clement Studebaker, jr., and six associates; E. H. Rollins & Sons; and Field, Glore, Ward & Co. They took part in a species of high financing that would have made the helpless consumer and the innocent investor quake if they had known about it. Mr. Studebaker and his six associates turned in $625,000 of par value capital stock of the two Delaware companies and received securities having a stated value of $11,942,135, or almost 20 for 1; Rollins & Sons was less fortunate, since for $625,000 of identical stock that concern received only $10,066,560 in securities, or nearly $2,000,000 less than the Studebaker group; but Field, Glore, Ward & Co. evened matters up, receiving $2,422,238 of securities for only $125,000 of par value capital stock.

The foregoing account of holding-company financing will give an indication of the extravagant watering of stock on which the pillaged consumer must pay the interest; and if the original corporations are "milked," as is too often the case, the innocent investor loses much or all of his original investment. For a perfect example of the "milking" of sound institutions by holding schemes, one need not go outside of the South. The majority of the stock of a magnificent newspaper property, valued at millions of dollars and with more than $1,300,000 cash in bank, was purchased by a group of financiers. A holding company was formed, and the $1,300,000 was deliberately taken from the assets of the newspaper corporation. Not so many months ago the newspaper went into the hands of a receiver and was sold for less than half its value. Bondholders and minority stockholders in the newspaper, who had purchased these securities in good faith, helplessly saw the assets back of their investment dissipated and the values of their holdings drop 50 per cent or more through a process of financial high binding.

It is scarcely matter for wonder if in this maze of unregulated holding-company freebooting the memories of financiers who deal in mergers and reconsolidations should be weakened; that holding-company officials should forget all about the picayune sum of $44,100 drawn out in cash. Neither Martin J. Insull nor his treasurer, when questioned by the Federal trade commissioner, could recall, or perhaps they dare not do so, why or how that amount was expended by their company.

Unless Federal control is speedily invoked it may be discovered that holding-company officials have permitted lapses of memory to grow from a habit into a disease, and then, instead of forgetting about sums of $44,000, they will not be able to remember what happened in transactions involving hundreds of thousands or millions of dollars.

"BACK TO THE FARM" MOVEMENT

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a letter from Rev. Benjamin Charles Few, of Rogers, Ark., suggesting a "back to the farm" movement and some methods for carrying out that movement.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

ROGERS, ARK., February 1, 1932.

Senator JOSEPH T. ROBINSON,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR ROBINSON: I am keenly interested in the movements inaugurated for establishing confidence and credit in the Nation. These activities are essential, of course. Yet my own thinking is that in order to bring about a permanent prosperity it is necessary to link these devices into an agency for independence which is not dependent upon world markets. Whatever may be said of the wealth piled up during our recent foray into the world markets as an industrial nation, it remains that security of economy along with security of our ideals must be first grounded in the home. I mean to say that the farm home must solve our problem; our people must be brought to a contentment with such conditions as their genius and energy can shape from the facilities in the farm home; and industrialized sections must be removed from their vantage point to make their actual slavery less alluring in comparison with conditions on the farm. The farm-bred thousands among the unemployed of every State must be aided to return to the farm, where, although they can not hope for wealth, they will be assured of the essentials of livelihood.

Much is being said of direct aid in the matter of unemployment, and the ugly word "dole" usually creeps into a discussion to make the idea repugnant. We do not relish the pauperizing idea of a dole; but direct help is in the offing. It therefore seems attractive to "kill two birds with one stone." In view of the tremendous needs of the insurance companies, along with the pauperism of the railroads, some plan should be worked out whereby selected persons could be aided in buying lands which the insurance companies hold so that insurance companies might liquidate this frozen asset and the liability of an unemployed family transferred to the assets of the Nation.

It seems that by cooperation, grouping all the properties of the insurance companies together, and making available their records for aid, these companies could help in this by using the liabilities on their books in the form of loan or cash values of insurance contracts to help buy their own lands, making their liabilities convertible into assets. There are many ways of helping to do this desirable thing.

I am not unmindful of the grave and forbidding aspects in present low price and lack of market for farm products. But the movement itself will solve a part of this problem by reestablishing a confidence which will make prices better. Take one-third of the unemployed out of the cities, off the lists of charity organizations, and prices of everything from farm labor to silk hats will feel the impetus.

The first upward trend of prices must be in farm real estate. (Of course, I speak without considering the possibility of a temporary upturn through war on a scale which will make considerable demands upon our resources.) The suffering millions who have gone through a nightmare experience recently ought to be aided to get into homes on the farm before that price advances overmuch. These will make better farmers, with a wider background in their social life and a kindlier attitude toward the real culture of life for having made their mistake, and it is my studied judgment that millions are ready to cash in on their experience and accept a less rosy and a more secure life.

My apology for this long letter is my extreme interest in a patriotic service that is much too big for any single individual or section. I yearn for the privilege of working actively in the interest of rehabilitation of our national character. I am thrilled with the rare opportunities for service which this present day holds. Never a day was grander than this, measured by the chance to live bravely and to do daring things in the interest of mankind. Never in our Nation has there been so grave a threat of dissolution and destruction. If the Government permits the defeatist attitude of the soup kitchen to grip the emotions of a sick nation and let that attitude arise into a flame, it will be too horrible to contemplate. This problem is not going to be solved by the thinking of the masses. It will be determined by the power of an intelligent leadership to grip and direct the emotions of the unthinking rank and file by a genuinely constructive helpfulness, or else it will be seen that the outcome is a bursting of volcanic power in an elemental state of madness and flaming passion.

With eager hope and readiness to serve my country and my day, and with kindest personal regards, I am,

Cordially yours, B. C. FEW.

THEODORE ROOSEVELT'S WORLD PEACE PLAN

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD Theodore Roosevelt's World Peace Plan, reprinted from the New York Times of October 4 and October 18, 1914.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The article is as follows:

[Reprinted from the New York Times of October 4 and October 18, 1914]

THEODORE ROOSEVELT'S WORLD PEACE PLAN—LATE PRESIDENT, IN 1914, WROTE HIS VIEWS ON A QUESTION NOW REVIVED AT GENEVA

(In the light of the debate over disarmament at Geneva (and especially the Tardieu proposal); of recent events in China and of the unflinching opposition of the Republican leaders to the League of Nations, the following extracts from two articles by Theodore Roosevelt which appeared in the Times in October, 1914, are interesting.)

By Theodore Roosevelt

Events have clearly shown that it is the idlest of folly to assert, and little short of treason against the Nation for statesmen who should know better to pretend, that the salvation of any nation under existing world conditions can be trusted to treaties, to little bits of paper with names signed on them, but without any efficient force behind them.

At present in every great crisis treaties have shown themselves not worth the paper they are written on, and the multitude of peace congresses that have been held have failed to secure even the slighest tangible result, as regards any contest in which the passions of great nations were fully aroused and their vital interests really concerned. In other words, each nation at present in any crisis of fundamental importance has to rely purely on its own power, its own strength, its own individual force. The futility of international agreements in great crises has come from the fact that force was not back of them.

What is needed in international matters is to create a judge, and then put police power back of the judge.

FEAR OF NEIGHBORS

The essential thing to do is to free each nation from the besetting fear of its neighbor. This can only be done by removing the causes of such fear. The neighbor must no longer be a danger.

Mere disarmament will not accomplish this result, and the disarmament of the free and enlightened people, so long as a single despotism or barbarism were left armed, would be a hideous calamity. If armaments were reduced while causes of trouble were in no way removed, wars would probably become somewhat more frequent, just because they would be less expensive and less decisive. It is greatly to be desired that the growth of armaments should be arrested, but they can not be arrested while present conditions continue. Mere treaties, mere bits of paper with names signed to them and with no force back of them, have proved utterly worthless for the protection of nations, and where they are the only alternatives it is not only right, but necessary, that each nation should arm itself so as to be able to cope with any possible foe.

* * * * * * *

The one permanent move for obtaining peace which has yet been suggested with a reasonable chance of obtaining its object is by an agreement among the great powers in which each should pledge itself not only to abide by the decisions of a common tribunal, but to back with force the decision of that common tribunal. The great civilized nations of the world which do possess force, actual or immediately potential, should combine by solemn agreement in a great world league for the peace of righteousness. A court should be created—a changed and amplified Hague court would meet the requirements—composed of representatives from each nation; these representatives being sworn to act in each case as judges, pure and simple, and not in a representative capacity.

The nations should agree on certain rights that should not be questioned, such as their territorial integrity, their rights to deal with their own domestic affairs, and with such matters as whom they should or should not admit to residence and citizenship within their own borders. All should guarantee each of their number in the possession of these rights. All should agree that other matters at issue between any of them, or between any of them and any one of a number of specified outside civilized nations, should be submitted to the court as above constituted.

ENFORCEMENT OF DECREES

They should furthermore agree not only to abide, each of them, by the decision of the court, but all of them to unite with their military forces to enforce the decree of the court as against any recalcitrant member. Under these circumstances it would be possible to agree on a limitation of armaments that would be real and effective.

If any nation were unwilling to go into such a general agreement with other nations, it would of necessity have to depend upon its own armed strength for its own protection. This is the only alternative. Treaties unbacked by force can not be considered as an alternative by any sober persons of sound judgment.

Of course, if there were not reasonable good faith among the nations making such an agreement, it would fail. But it would not fail merely because one nation did not observe good faith. It would be impossible to say that such an agreement would at once and permanently bring universal peace, but it would certainly mark an immense advance. It would certainly mean that the chances of war were minimized and the prospects of limiting and confining and regulating war immensely increased. At present force, as represented by the armed strength of each nation, is wholly divorced from such instrumentalities for securing peace as international agreements and treaties. In consequence, the latter are practically impotent in great crises.

FORCE AND JUSTICE

There is no connection between force on the one hand and any scheme for securing international peace or justice on the other. Under these conditions every wise and upright nation must continue to rely for its own peace and well-being on its own force, its own strength. As all students of the law know, a right without a remedy is in no real sense of the word a right at all. In international matters, the declaration of a right, or the announcement of a worthy purpose, is not only aimless but is a just cause for derision and may even be mischievous, if force is not put behind the right or the purpose. Our business is to make force the agent of justice, the instrument in international matters, as it has been made in municipal matters, in matters within each nation.

Such a scheme as the one briefly outlined will not bring perfect justice any more than under municipal law we obtain perfect justice, but will mark an immeasurable advance on anything now existing, for it will mean that at last a long stride has been taken in the effort to put the collective strength of civilized mankind behind the collective purpose of mankind to secure the peace of righteousness, the peace of justice among the nations of the earth.

It may be, though I sincerely hope to the contrary, that such a scheme is, for the immediate future, Utopian—it certainly will not be Utopian for the future. If it be impossible in the immediate future to devise some working scheme by which force shall be put behind righteousness in disinterested and effective fashion where international wrongs are concerned, then the only alternative will be for each free people to keep itself in shape with its own strength to defend its own rights and interests and, meanwhile, to do all that can be done to help forward the slow growth of sentiment which is assuredly, although very gradually, telling against international wrongdoing and violence.

Man, in recognizably human shape, has been for ages on this planet, and the extraordinary discoveries in Egypt and Mesopotamia now enable us to see in dim fashion the beginning of historic times 6,000 or 7,000 years ago. In the earlier ages of which history speaks there was practically no such thing as an international conscience. The armies of Babylon and Assyria, Egypt and Persia, felt no sense of obligation to outsiders and conquered merely because they wished to conquer.

In Greece a very imperfect recognition of international right grew up so far as Greek communities were concerned, but it never extended to barbarians. In the Roman Empire this feeling grew slightly, if only for the reason that so many nations were included in its bounds and were forced to live peaceably together. In the Middle Ages the common Christianity of Europe created a real bond. There was at least a good deal of talk about the duties of Christian nations to one another, and although the action along the lines of the talk was lamentably insufficient, still the talk itself represented the dawning recognition of the fact that each nation might owe something to other nations and that it was not right to base action purely on self-interest.

SENTIMENT AGAINST WAR

There has undoubtedly been a wide expansion of this feeling during the past few centuries * * * there is a real advance in good will, respect, and understanding between the United States and all the other nations of the earth. The advance is not steady and it is interrupted at times by acts of unwisdom, which are quite as apt to be committed by ourselves as by other peoples, but the advance has gone on. There is far greater sentiment than ever before against unwarranted aggressions by stronger powers against weak powers; there is far greater feeling against misconduct, whether in small or big powers, and far greater feeling against brutality in war.

There is every reason to feel dissatisfied with the slow progress that has been made in putting a stop to wrongdoing. It is our bounden duty to act now so as to secure redress for wrongdoing, but, nevertheless, we must also recognize the fact that there is now a good deal of real sentiment, and some efficient sentiment, against international wrongdoing. There has been and is a real growth toward international peace, justice, and fair dealing.

We have still a long way to go before reaching the goal, but at least we have gone a little way toward the goal. The growth will continue. We must do everything we can to make it continue.

RELIEF OF UNEMPLOYMENT

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President, I send to the desk a splendid editorial by Judge John W. Dodge, appearing in the Gadsden County Times (Florida), which I desire to have printed in the RECORD.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The article is as follows:

[From the Gadsden County Times, Thursday, February 11, 1932]

"WE PLAN"—THE PRESIDENT'S PLAN

By Judge John W. Dodge

Almost every newspaper, magazine, or periodical we read has a proposed plan to do away with the depression. They are too numerous to even mention.

Let us start with the President's plan. In his Indianapolis address President Hoover said:

"I am able to propose an American plan to you."

He told us over the radio before his election that poverty would be banished from the United States. We are now wondering if his "American plan" is what he prophetically forecast or is it what we have experienced since his election.

Again, he says now, "We plan more leisure for men and women and better opportunities for its enjoyment." With about 6,000,000 idle now who want work and others starving, except for donated relief, and homes sold and clothing worn out, are we to have more such "leisure" and "opportunities" and "enjoyment"? Is that his "American plan"? Sounds like and seems to be more of a "British plan," as we think of dear old England's condition.

Again, however, he now says: "We plan to secure a greater diffusion of wealth, a decrease of poverty, and a great reduction in crime. And this plan will be carried out if we just keep on giving the American people a chance." Undoubtedly the "American people," the masses as distinguished from the special classes, the fewer but wealthier millionaires—the "American people"—have had "a greater diffusion" of what wealth they had scrimped and saved for their future—it has been diffused. But into whose possession, hands, and control has it landed?

United States Steel in 1931, under the "American plan" of our President, "depleted resources to the extent of $48,000,000 by paying dividends last year with no earnings on the common—the span from the high price of last year to current levels has cost the share owners over a billion dollars in reduced market values—stock is being offered to employees at $40 a share, which contrasts with a similar offer last year at $140," says the Financial World on February 10, 1932, page 25. Was that and is that the President's "American plan" for a greater diffusion of wealth, a decrease in poverty?

We need a different "American plan" than the one in vogue at present as now being administered.

GRAZING FEES AND LIVESTOCK VALUES IN WYOMING

Mr. CAREY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD telegrams from the presidents of the Sublette County Cattle Growers' Association and the Johnson County Wool Growers' Association, of Wyoming, and a letter from the president of the Lincoln County (Wyo.) Wool Growers' Association, favoring a reduction in grazing fees. Also in that connection I desire to have printed in the RECORD an article which appeared in the Denver Post under date of February 6, 1932, giving figures to show the decline in livestock values in Wyoming during the past two years.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The telegrams and article are as follows:

BUFFALO, WYO., February 13, 1932.

ROBERT CAREY,
United States Senate:

Believe it very important to secure reduction grazing fees, forest reserve. Present conditions require every economy, and Government should assist growers to save industry.

JOHN ESPONDA,
President Johnson County Wool Growers' Association.

PINEDALE, WYO., February 9, 1932.

Hon. ROBERT B. CAREY,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

In regard to the resolution introduced by you in conjunction with Senator THOMAS of Idaho, and supported by Senator ODDIE, of Nevada, for the 50 per cent reduction in grazing fees on national forest for one year meets with hearty approval of our association.

SUBLETTE COUNTY CATTLE GROWERS' ASSOCIATION,
L. H. HENNICK, President.

LINCOLN COUNTY WOOL GROWERS' ASSOCIATION,
Rock Springs, Wyo., February 5, 1932.

Senator ROBERT D. CAREY,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR CAREY: I have read with a great deal of interest comments on Senator JOHN THOMAS'S of Idaho and your continued fight for the lowering of grazing fees. Recently I wrote him a letter of appreciation for his continued support in our behalf. I wish you would go over this letter with him and see if there isn't something that can be done.

It seems so absurd to have to plead the cause of the sheep business. The industry has been hit so bad and for so long a time that one would think that a reader in the primary grade of the public schools knows the troubles of the sheep business. Why do we have to continually plead with our own United States for assistance when they have poured so many millions into foreign governments? Does it not seem that our Government should begin to recognize that the sheep business is in a deplorable state and that it needs help?

I made the statement a year ago, and I reiterate, that our National Government could have done more good for the sheep industry by waiving the 1931 fees, or at least cutting them in two, than any other move—not so much in the saving of money to the individual sheep outfits but from the force of their example to others, railroads in their rates, herders in their wages, and all other expenses down the line.

You, of course, must be aware of the terrible winter conditions that we are facing in Wyoming this year. With the weather constantly colder—reports of 18, 20, 30, and 35 below zero—following the drought last summer, the sheepman has one of two recourses: Let his stock perish entirely or feed corn, cotton cake, or some grain with baled hay. You can well appreciate from your experience what putting out baled hay is going to do to the financial structure of the sheep outfits with prospects for income as the price of wool they are talking for this coming spring. This condition has just about exhausted the pioneer sheepmen, who are about ready to give up in disgust.

This letter could go on and on and it would not recount anything that you do not know or that has not been discussed and explained time and time again during the last two years.

We would appreciate your continued work in our half.

Yours very truly,

B. J. CAROLLO, President.

WYOMING STOCK HAS INCREASED IN LAST TWO YEARS—VALUATION, HOWEVER, FALLS 50.5 PER CENT SINCE 1930 VALUATION

CHEYENNE, WYO., February 6 (A. P.).—Wyoming livestock has increased in numbers the last two years, but valuations have declined 50.5 per cent, A. J. King, statistician for the Federal-State cooperative crop and livestock reporting service, said this week in his annual report.

The total value of all livestock on hand January 1 was $41,166,000 compared with $63,566,000 a year ago and $83,155,000 in 1930.

The figures, King emphasized, were the inventory values of all livestock on farms January 1 and did not include the valuation of livestock production nor the income from livestock.

"The number of cattle in Wyoming continued the increase begun in 1928, and the number on hand January 1, 1932, was 863,000 head compared with 830,000 a year ago and 790,000 in 1930," King said.

AVERAGE VALUE SHOWS MARKED DECREASE IN THREE YEARS

"The average value has shown a marked decrease during the last three years, and on January 1 was $24.50 a head compared with $40.30 a year ago and $54.30 two years ago, giving a total valuation of $21,122,000 this year and $33,490,000 a year ago and $42,875,000 in 1930."

King said there was little change in the number of dairy cattle on hand, there being 72,000 head in the State January 1.

Wyoming sheep increased in numbers from 3,540,000 head in 1930 to 4,128,000 on January 1, 1932. The total valuation of Wyoming sheep on January 1 was $14,850,000 compared with $32,466,000 two years ago, the decrease totaling $17,616,000 and the increase in numbers 17 per cent.

There were 123,000 head of swine on January 1 compared with 137,000 a year ago. The value per head was $5.40 this year and $12 two years ago. The total value was $662,000 this year and $1,482,000 last year.

BALANCING THE BUDGET

Mr. COSTIGAN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an article entitled "The Nation's Task of Balancing Its Budget," which appeared in the New York Times of yesterday. It was written by the nationally known journalist and author, Mr. Charles Merz.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. President, in connection with the request made by the Senator from Colorado [Mr. COSTIGAN] it seems to me very important that there be included in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD the graphs contained in the article in the New York Times. The drawings are merely line drawings, and I ask that they may be included in the RECORD.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The article and the accompanying graphs are as follows:

THE NATION'S TASK OF BALANCING ITS BUDGET—WITH THE TREASURY DEFICIT RAPIDLY GROWING, LEADERS IN CONGRESS SEEK A WAY TO REVERSE THE TREND NEXT YEAR—FACTORS INVOLVED IN PARING EXPENSES AND ADDING TO INCOME—THE VARIOUS PROPOSALS

By Charles Merz

The Ways and Means Committee of the House of Representatives began last week to draft a tax bill which aims at a balanced Budget. Its interest in this question rises above the routine duty of finding money with which to meet expenditures in an ordinary year. Leaders of both parties in the House have declared that an important factor in restoring confidence is to give the country proof that there is at least one public agency in a debt-ridden world whose credit position is impregnable and whose affairs are water-tight—the Government of the United States.

The present difficulties of this Government are a matter of common knowledge. After a series of fortunate years from 1921 to 1930 it closed its books last June with a deficit of $903,000,000. This was not only the largest peace-time deficit in the country's history; it was a larger deficit, in proportion to income, than that of any other important government in the world. Measured in these terms, an accurate way of taking a financial sounding, the deficit of the British Government was six-tenths of 1 per cent; the deficit of the German Government was 9 per cent; the deficit of our own Government was 27.

But this is only the prelude to a still more formidable situation. The Government keeps its books by fiscal years, which begin on July 1 and end on the following June 30. Large as its deficit was last year, its deficit for the present year, of which we have now reached the eighth month, will be far larger.

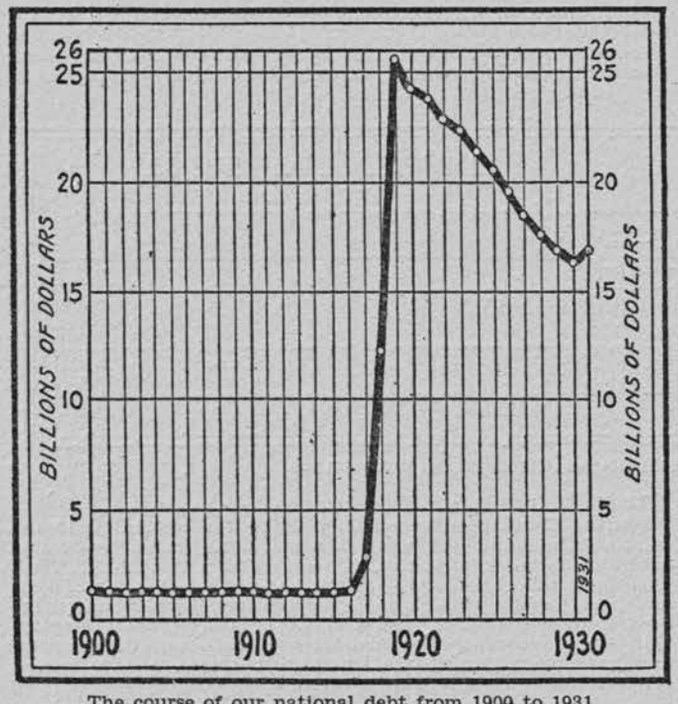
THIS YEAR'S DEFICIT



President Hoover estimated in his message to Congress last December that the figure would reach $2,123,000,000, thereby more than doubling last year's deficit. But events have overtaken this prediction. The Government's receipts are running approximately $100,000,000 below its estimates of last December. Its expenditures have been increased beyond anything contemplated in the Budget by the appropriation of $500,000,000 for the new Reconstruction Finance Corporation and of $125,000,000 for the Federal farm loan system. While these sums will be used for the purpose of advancing loans rather than of making gifts and while they are expected to return to the Treasury when the present storm is over, they will appear as expenditures when the Government balances its books in June and increase its costs accordingly. With receipts falling below expectations and expenses rising above, this year's deficit will be closer to $3,000,000,000 than to $2,000,000,000.

That anything can be done to reduce this deficit substantially, no one in Washington believes. The year is too far gone. Half of the revenue is already in. Nearly two-thirds of the expenditure is already out. But the new fiscal year which now looms ahead, the year which begins next July, is another matter.

ACTION FOR THE COMING YEAR

In his message to Congress the President urged that for this new fiscal year certain economies be made and certain taxes be increased, in order to bring the Government within about $500,000,000 of balancing its Budget. By taking these steps, he said, the Government would then be in a position to balance its Budget entirely in the following year, 1933–34.

During the two months since this advice was given to Congress, the opinion has plainly gained ground in Washington that the Government ought not wait until 1933–34 to square its receipts

The course of our national debt from 1900 to 1931 with its expenditures, but should, if possible, present the Nation with a balanced Budget in the fiscal year which begins in July.

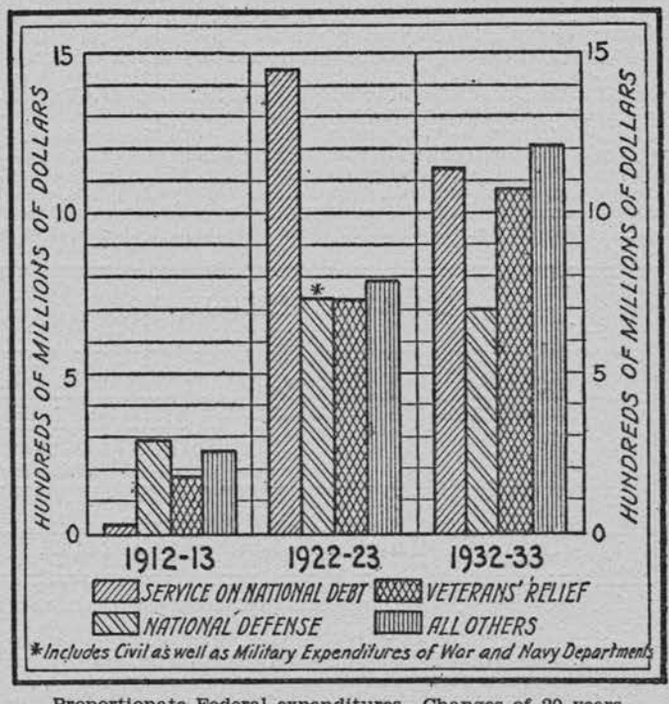
This policy was recommended to the Ways and Means Committee recently by the new Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. Mills. It has prompted the Democratic Speaker of the House, Mr. GARNER, to pledge himself to "work incessantly to accomplish the balancing of the National Budget not later than sometime in 1933."

If this proposal goes beyond the earlier program submitted to Congress, and contemplates more immediate action, it is not difficult to find the reason. The two months since the President's message of last December have unquestionably been disappointing, both at home and abroad. The threat of war in China, the forced abandonment of the Lausanne conference to discuss German reparations, and the political uncertainty which continues to rule central Europe have been disturbing influences in the foreign news. Meantime, hoarding of currency in the United States, due to lack of confidence in the immediate future, has reached a total estimated by the President at $1,300,000,000. What are presumably the best securities in the world, bonds of the United States Government, backed by the total resources of the American people, sell at prices substantially below par.

PROMOTION OF CONFIDENCE



It is the belief of many of the public officials and party leaders who urge Congress to balance the Federal Budget without further loss of time that no single act could promote confidence more effectively; that the decision to take this step would bring money out of hoarding by showing it one absolutely safe investment; that it would end the drain on our gold reserves resulting from the desire of nervous investors in foreign countries to repatriate their funds; that it would arrest the process of rapidly undoing all that was done between 1920 and 1930 to reduce the national debt by $9,000,000,000; that it would enable the Government to borrow on better terms the large additional sums that it must have in order to pay its bills during the four months that remain of the present fiscal year; that it would promptly lift the prices of all Government securities, and thereby strengthen the position of banks which are now reluctant to make loans, and that it would give an uneasy public the assurance that Federal credit stood like Gibraltar in a world of swirling currents.

For those officials in Washington who hold these views, the goal, then, is a balanced Budget in 1932–33, that is, in the fiscal year immediately ahead. What factors enter into the problem? How much could be done by reducing Federal expenditures? How much would be needed in new taxes? What alternative plans for new taxes have been proposed?

The business of making a Federal Budget begins with an estimate of necessary expenditures and then raises the question of finding revenue with which to meet them.

I—EXPENDITURES

Congress now has before it a sheaf of bills which represents the President's estimates of the cost of operating the Federal Government in 1932–33, estimates totaling $4,112,909,950. A division of all expenditures into two main groups is readily noted. There are certain "fixed" items which Congress can not dodge. There are other items which, for want of a better phrase, can be described as "movable." Let us consider them in this order:

Proportionate Federal expenditures—Changes of 20 years

(A) FIXED EXPENDITURES

The first and most obvious fixed charge is interest on the national debt—a debt entirely due, in its present proportions, to American participation in the World War, since it rose suddenly in 1917 from $1,200,000,000, a point near which it had hovered lazily for more than half a century, to $25,400,000,000 in 1919. The Government must pay interest on approximately $18,000,000,000 now outstanding. For this purpose the Budget for 1932–33 allots $640,000,000, or 15.6 per cent of the year's expenditures as a whole.

The second fixed charge is closely allied to the first one, namely, payment of principal on the debt, made for the purpose of gradually reducing it—in other words, the sinking fund. At the present time this term is a misnomer, since the debt is rising faster than the sinking fund can sink it. Nevertheless, the Treasury regards this as an indispensable item in the Budget, constituting a pledge of continued debt reduction when the Government's revenues again exceed its expenditures. Payment of principal during 1932–33 is estimated at $496,803,400, or 12.1 per cent of the Budget.

The third fixed charge is far smaller than either of its predecessors. It consists of refunds of customs receipts and taxes which, if based upon just claims, the Government can not avoid. This item is estimated at $64,301,100 in the new Budget, or 1.5 per cent of the total

SUMS FOR VETERANS' RELIEF

Finally, there is the appropriation for veterans' relief, including payment made into the adjusted-service-certificate fund. Technically, this is not a fixed charge, since it would be possible for Congress to scale down the expenditures of the Veterans' Administration by repealing existing laws. Actually, there is no likelihood that this will be done. Neither party in the House of Representatives is considering it. For all practical purposes, the cost of veterans' relief is a fixed charge, and the largest of all charges, whether fixed or movable. To this purpose the Budget allots $1,072,064,527, or 26.1 per cent of the total.

These four fixed items—interest on the national debt, payment of principal, tax refunds, and veterans' relief—aggregate $2,272,899,027, or 55.3 per cent of the total, in the estimates for the new year.

It is at once clear that any effort to balance the Budget by reducing expenditures is heavily handicapped at the outset by the fact that Congress has no real control over items comprising more than half of the cost of Government.

Any reduction of costs must accordingly take place entirely within the 44.7 per cent of the Budget which represents movable expenditures.

(B) MOVABLE EXPENDITURES

In considering the smaller part of the Budget, which is comparatively flexible, it is convenient to divide the Government's expenditures into six main groups: (1) National defense, (2) public works, (3) law enforcement, (4) special aids to special interests, (5) the postal deficit, and (6) miscellaneous appropriations for a wide variety of less expensive purposes.

(1) National defense.—The Budget carries $694,805,800 for national defense, exclusive of the sums spent by the War Department for nonmilitary purposes. This is 16.9 per cent of the Budget as a whole, and the largest item it contains, with the exception of the appropriation for veterans' relief. Military expenditures are estimated at $319,696,200, an increase of about $7,000,000 over those for the boom year 1929; naval expenditures, at $374,836,600, an increase of about $10,000,000.

(2) Public works.—This heading includes both the normal activities of the Government in constructing public buildings, roads, harbors, etc., and the emergency construction it has undertaken for the purpose of increasing employment. For this purpose the Budget carries an estimate of $392,873,000 (9.5 per cent of the total). This is not far short of twice the amount spent for the same purpose in 1929, when the problem of unemployment was comparatively small, but about one-fourth less than is being spent during the current fiscal year.

(3) Law enforcement.—For the support of the courts, the enforcement of prohibition, and other Federal laws, and the activities of the various regulatory commissions of the Government, the Budget proposes to appropriate $101,300,100 (2.5 per cent of the total). This is an increase of $25,000,000 over 1929.

(4) Special aids.—Here are listed items calling for an appropriation of $227,693,200 (5.5 per cent of the Budget), to be distributed as follows: Aids to agriculture, $73,000,000; aids to industry and trade, $15,000,000; aids to labor, $7,000,000; aids to aviation, including losses on contract mail routes and foreign air mail routes, $29,000,000; aids to the merchant marine, including losses on transportation of foreign mail in American vessels, $103,000,000. The amount which it is proposed to spend for these purposes in 1932–33 is half again as large as in 1929, but it is about 45 per cent less than is being spent this year. This is due chiefly to the fact that it is proposed to add no new appropriations next year to what remains of the "revolving fund" at the service of the Farm Board.

(5) Postal Deficiency.—After deducting losses listed in the previous paragraph, under aids to the merchant marine and aviation, this item amounts to $116,519,000 (2.8 per cent of the Budget).

(6) Miscellaneous.—Finally, there remain certain miscellaneous expenditures, not easily grouped elsewhere, amounting to $306,819,823 (7.5 per cent of the Budget). The largest items in this group are 80 millions, for trust funds and 78 millions for fiscal administration, including control of currency and banking.

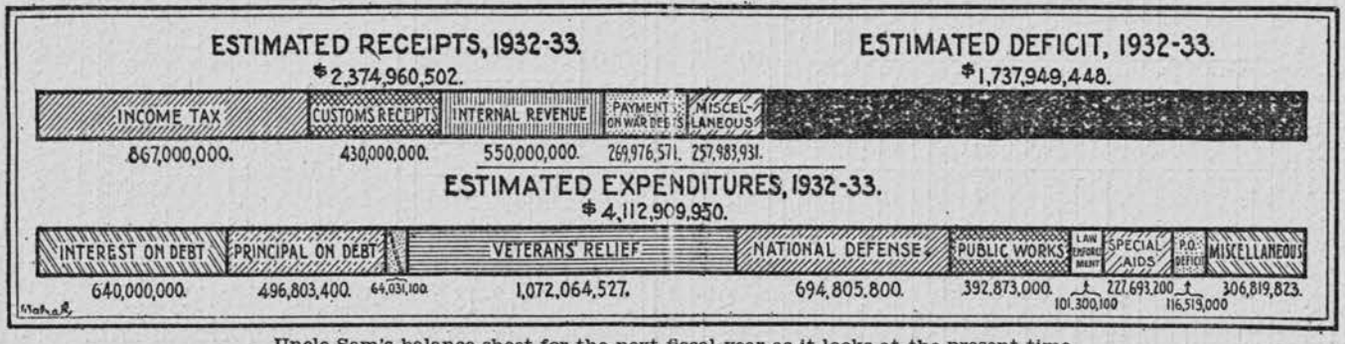
These are the "movable" expenditures, amounting in the aggregate to $1,840,010,923, over which Congress has some measure of control. How much could be cut from this part of the Budget, the comparatively flexible 44.7 per cent of it, if Congress were prepared to go about the task in a militantly economic mood?

No definite answer can be made to this question, but one comparison is instructive. In the boom year 1929, when business was prosperous and taxes poured an ample revenue into the Federal Treasury, the Government spent $203,000,000 less for these various purposes than it now proposes to spend in 1932–33. Meantime, retail costs have declined by 14.3 per cent and wholesale costs by 31.8 per cent. At least in theory, therefore, it is possible to cut some such sum as $400,000,000 from the Budget, without bringing the expenditures of the Government below their level in 1929, measured in terms of the purchasing power of money.

HOW FAR WILL CONGRESS GO?

It is impossible to foresee what action Congress will take. It may go this far, if it is sufficiently impressed by the arguments of those who urge a balanced Budget. It may so still farther and put the Government back on the basis of its expenditures in 1927, when it spent $600,000,000 less than it proposes to spend in 1932–33, using a currency which had less value. It is also possible that Congress will take the opposite tack and appropriate funds in excess of the President's estimates, by adopting one or another of the various plans proposed for new naval construction, additional farm relief, or an enlarged program of public works.

For the present, let us assume that the President's estimates remain substantially intact. As noted above, the total expenditure recommended in these estimates, in both fixed and flexible items, is $4,112,909,950. Barring action on the part of Congress in the direction either of reducing expenditures or increasing them, this is the sum which must be raised in revenue next year in order to achieve a balanced Budget.



II—REVENUE

Against this proposed expenditure of $4,112,909,950, the Treasury estimates that the Government will receive next year, if taxes remain unchanged, revenue amounting to $2,374,960,502. In round numbers the difference between these figures is $1,738,000,000, appearing, unfortunately, on the wrong side of the ledger. This is the deficit now indicated for 1932–33 and the distance to be traveled to a balanced Budget. What sources of new income are available to the Government?

The Treasury has four main sources, and only four:

First. Taxes on individual and corporate incomes, yielding in prosperous years about 50 per cent of the Government's receipts.

Second. Internal-revenue taxes, primarily on tobacco, but also on documentary stamps, estates, admissions and dues, playing cards, etc., yielding about 20 per cent.

Uncle Sam's balance sheet for the next fiscal year as it looks at the present time

Third. Customs receipts, yielding about 15 per cent.

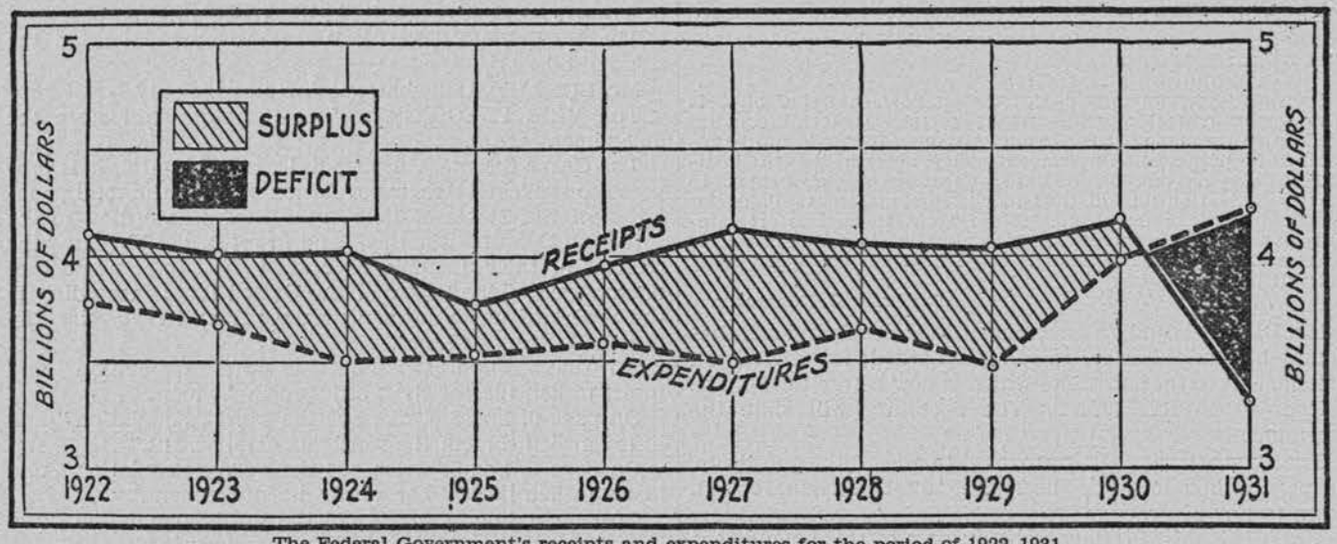
Fourth. Miscellaneous revenue, yielding the remaining 15 per cent and including such varied items as payments by foreign governments on their war debts, receipts from trust funds, Panama Canal tolls, fines, and penalties imposed for violation of Federal laws (chiefly prohibition), passport fees, licenses under the Federal water power act, sales of Government property (everything from waste paper to Alaskan sealskins), royalties from oil and gas, quarantine charges, immigration fees, and a modest revenue from gifts and contributions.

In the present circumstances, little can be expected of sources 3 and 4. Any increase in customs fees is necessarily dependent upon a gain in foreign trade; no faction of either party of Congress is now proposing to raise the high rates in the Hawley-Smoot Act, in the hope of adding to the Government's income.

Meantime, miscellaneous revenue lies for the most part beyond the control of Congress. Payments by foreign governments on their war debts, the largest single item, can not be revised upward in the face of existing treaties merely because we need revenue; we shall probably be fortunate, in fact, if the full amount of $270,000,000 included in the estimates is actually paid us in 1932–33. Receipts from trust funds change little from one year to another. Panama Canal tolls are at the lowest point since 1925. The other items are relatively unimportant.

There is just one place among these miscellaneous items where a windfall might add a substantial sum to the Treasury's income. The chairman of the Farm Board stated recently that the affairs of his bureau could be liquidated for $250,000,000. Since the $500,000,000 originally appropriated for the Farm Board is carried on the Treasury's books as money already spent, such liquidation would in effect add $250,000,000 in new revenue. But the farm bloc in Congress is militantly opposed to liquidation.

It is not surprising, in these circumstances, that all plans for increasing the revenue of the Government ignore sources 3 and 4 and fall back on sources 1 and 2—income taxes and internal revenue. This is true of the Treasury plan, of the Democratic plan, and of such independent plants as have won support in Washington.



(A) THE TREASURY PLAN

The program submitted to Congress by the Treasury Department would increase normal income-tax rates from the present 1½, 3, and 5 per cent to 2, 4, and 6; reduce personal exemptions for heads of families from $3,500 to $2,500 and for unmarried taxpayers from $1,500 to $1,000; replace the existing surtax of 20 per cent on incomes above $100,000 with a graded surtax rising from 37 per cent to 40; advance corporation taxes from 12 to 12½ per cent; increase present taxes on estates, on stock transfers and on tobacco; establish a 2-cent stamp tax on bank checks and drafts; place a 5 to 10 cent impost on telephone, telegraph, cable, and radio messages; increase amusement taxes; raise postal rates, and put a sales tax on automobiles, tires and accessories, and radios and phonographs.

The Treasury estimated in December that these taxes would add $920,000,000 in new revenue, but has now reduced its estimate to $786,000,000. This compares with the prospective deficit of $1,738,000,000 which we have already noted. As it now stands, the Treasury plan would accordingly require new economies on the part of Congress amounting to $952,000,000 if the Budget is to be balanced.

(B) THE DEMOCRATIC PLAN

When the Ways and Means Committee began its recent hearings, the Democratic members stated that they hoped to draft a plan which would differ from the Treasury's chiefly in two respects: It would avoid lowering present exemptions on personal-income taxes and abandon the "retroactive" feature of the Treasury's plan; that is, it would apply new rates of taxation to incomes earned during the calendar year 1932 instead of 1931, as the Treasury advised.

The Federal Government's receipts and expenditures for the period of 1922–1931

The proposals discussed by the Democratic Members of the committee have included: Increases in income taxes as recommended by the Treasury, but without lowering exemptions; the same maximum surtax of 40 per cent, but its application to incomes of $150,000 instead of $500,000; the same increase in corporation taxes; a lower tax on automobiles; repeal or modification of the capital gain-and-loss provision; a gift tax to prevent evasion of the estate-tax levy; a tax of 5 per cent on electrical energy, and of from 2 to 5 per cent on illuminating gas, to be collected from the consumer; a 5 per cent excise on oil, with a heavier tax on imports; and a levy of 10 cents a month on telephone sets, to be collected from the consumer through the telephone companies.

The Ways and Means Committee has asked the Treasury to estimate the amount of new revenue which this program would yield. No figures are now available.

In the face of forecasts which indicate a steadily increasing deficit, it seems likely that the Democratic Members will be forced to look to some of the suggestions advanced by various independent groups.

(C) INDEPENDENT PLANS

Four independent proposals have met with some support in Washington. They call, respectively, for higher surtaxes, for higher estate taxes, for a general sales tax, and for a tax on manufactures.

(1) Higher surtaxes.—In place of the Treasury's plan for surtaxes of from 37 to 40 per cent on incomes above $100,000, members of the Progressive bloc in Congress have proposed to restore the war-time rates of from 48 to 65 per cent. The Treasury replies that this plan would defeat its own purpose by drying up liquid resources which should be available as working capital for industry. Members of the Progressive bloc insist that it would yield an additional $120,000,000.

(2) Higher estate taxes.—This plan also owes its impetus to Progressive backing. Representative RAMSEYER of Iowa predicts that more than $400,000,000 in new revenue could be raised by a tax which began at 1 per cent on estate values at $10,000 or less and continued upward to 45 per cent on estates above $15,000,000.

(3) Sales tax.—Senator REED of Pennsylvania, the most active advocate of this plan, estimates that a general tax of one-half of 1 per cent upon all sales would net the Government, $2,000,000,000. The argument made in favor of this tax is the certainty of a large yield. In opposition it is argued that the tax would be difficult to administer, that it would involve duplication, and that by raising living costs it would place a burden on those least able to bear it.

(4) Tax on manufactures.—Finally, there is the plan for a tax on manufactured products. The American Petroleum Institute has proposed a levy of 1 per cent and, by estimating the value of manufactures at $60,000,000,000, has predicted that it would yield $600,000,000. This estimate would seem to be too high, since it assumes that the value of manufactures in 1932 will reach the level of 1927. A larger revenue, however, could be derived by increasing the tax. In Canada, where this plan is employed, the rate is 4 per cent.

Such a tax, of course, would add indirectly to the cost of living, though not to the same extent as a general sales tax. In its behalf, however, it is argued that it would be easier to administer than a sales tax, that it would avoid duplication, that it would manifestly yield a large revenue, and that, unlike special taxes on special products, it would put all industries on an even basis.

It is possible that before the Ways and Means Committee finishes drafting its bill it will borrow ideas from some of these four independents plans. Its goal, if it intends to balance the Budget, is to wipe out an indicated deficit of $1,738,000,000 by new taxes, new economies, or both.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT

A message in writing from the President of the United States submitting a nomination was communicated to the Senate by Mr. Latta, one of his secretaries.

RELIEF OF UNEMPLOYMENT

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 3045) to provide for cooperation by the Federal Government with the several States in relieving the hardship and suffering caused by unemployment, and for other purposes.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] has the floor.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, on Friday when I obtained the floor I was in hopes that some agreement to limit debate, which would result in the bill being disposed of to-day, might be adopted. That seems impossible at this time, and therefore I do not wish to speak this morning. I yield the floor.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Mr. President, I offer an amendment to the pending bill, which I ask may be printed and lie on the table.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be printed and lie on the table.

Mr. HATFIELD. Mr. President, I send to the desk an amendment in the nature of a substitute for the amendment of the Senator from Alabama [Mr. BLACK] to the pending bill, which I ask to have printed and lie on the table.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be printed and lie on the table.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Mr. President, there appears on the first page of this morning's Washington Post a very short news item, which, I think, has a very direct bearing on the pending bill. The article is very short, and I ask unanimous consent that it be read at the desk.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the clerk will read, as requested.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

[From the Washington Post, February 15, 1932]

HOOVER IS LEADING MURRAY IN BALLOT

DES MOINES, IOWA, February 14.—President Hoover and W. H. (Alfalfa Bill) Murray are running neck and neck in a newspaper presidential straw vote, latest results of which were announced in a copyrighted story in the Des Moines Sunday Register.

The latest tabulations showed Hoover had 10,291 votes in his home State, to 9,597 for Murray. All Democratic candidates, however, were running ahead of all Republican presidential possibilities, with 25,845 votes to 11,716. On the Democratic side the tabulation showed Roosevelt, 8,749; Smith, 2,822; Baker, 2,532; and Ritchie, 1,525.

Mr. WAGNER. I send to the desk a telegram which I received from the Governor of the State of New York, which I ask unanimous consent to have read. It is quite brief.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the Secretary will read the telegram.

The Chief Clerk read the telegram, as follows:

ALBANY, N. Y., February 10, 1932.

Hon. ROBERT F. WAGNER,
United States Senate:

I am glad you are working for the employment relief bill. It is an important factor in the present emergency. It will equalize the burden throughout the Nation. Although it should not be regarded as a permanent Government policy, nevertheless it is justified as carrying out the definite obligation of Government to prevent starvation and distress in this present crisis. Plans for large public works are possible if the works themselves are carefully planned and economically necessary, but they do not relieve distress at this moment. That is why I hope the emergency relief bill will pass.

FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT.

Mr. DILL. I send an amendment to the desk and ask that it may be read. I desire to call it up a little later. It is an amendment to the substitute which is now before the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state the amendment.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to amend the substitute, on page 4, line 16, after the figure " 6," by striking out all down to line 20 on page 4.

Mr. DILL. Mr. President, the purpose of this amendment is to strike out that part of the substitute in section 5 that requires the governor to recommend to the legislature of his State and the people thereof the action that may be necessary and appropriate to insure repayment to the United States of the amount received by the State pursuant to its request. I do not know what order of business is now before the Senate, and I will not at present discuss the amendment further.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from New York [Mr. WAGNER], which will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 5, lines 4, 5, and 6, it is proposed to strike out the words " their population bears to the total population of the States of the United States according to the Fifteenth Decennial Census " and insert in lieu thereof " the number of their unemployed bears to the total number of unemployed of the States of the United States according to the report of unemployment, classes A and B, of the Fifteenth Decennial Census."

On page 5, line 8, strike out the word " population " and insert in lieu thereof the word " unemployment."

On page 6, line 3, strike out the word " population " and insert in lieu thereof the word " unemployment."

On page 6, line 5, strike out the word " population " and insert in lieu thereof the word " unemployment."

On page 6, line 23, strike out the word " population " and insert in lieu thereof the word " unemployment."

On page 8, line 22, strike out the word " population " and insert in lieu thereof the word " unemployment."

On page 9, line 5, strike out the word " population " and insert in lieu thereof the word " unemployment."

On page 9, line 8, strike out the word " population " and insert in lieu thereof the word " unemployment."

On page 10, line 12, strike out the word " population " and insert in lieu thereof the word " unemployment."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is upon agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from New York.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President, is that an amendment to the proposed substitute or to the original bill?

The VICE PRESIDENT. It is an amendment to the original bill. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The original bill is open to further amendment. The Chair understood the Senator from West Virginia to state that he had an amendment which he desired to offer.

Mr. DILL. Mr. President, I have an amendment pending.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is it an amendment to the original bill?

Mr. DILL. No; my amendment is proposed to a substitute.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Amendments to the original bill have not yet been completed, and therefore the amendment of the Senator from Washington is not now in order.

Mr. BORAH. May I ask if the amendment which the Senator from New York offered was to the original bill?

The VICE PRESIDENT. It was an amendment to the original bill.

Mr. BORAH. And what was the amendment?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state the amendment again.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 5, lines 4, 5, and 6, it is proposed to strike out " their population bears to the total population of the States of the United States according to the Fifteenth Decennial Census " and insert in lieu thereof " the number of their unemployed bears to the total number of unemployed of the States of the United States according to the report of unemployment, classes A and B, of the Fifteenth Decennial Census."

On page 5, line 8, strike out the word " population " and insert in lieu thereof the word " unemployment."

On page 8, line 22, strike out the word " population " and insert in lieu thereof the word " unemployment."

On page 9, line 5, strike out the word " population " and insert in lieu thereof the word " unemployment."

On page 9, line 8, strike out the word " population " and insert in lieu thereof the word " unemployment."

On page 10, line 12, strike out the word " population " and insert in lieu thereof the word " unemployment."

Mr. MCKELLAR. Mr. President——

Mr. COSTIGAN. Mr. President, the amendment offered by the Senator from New York to the original bill was adopted under a misapprehension. If I may do so, I should like to move a reconsideration of the vote whereby the amendment was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to a reconsideration of the vote? The Chair hears none, and the vote by which the amendment was adopted is reconsidered.

Mr. MCKELLAR. That is what I intended to ask for.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is now upon the amendment offered by the Senator from New York.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I shall be pleased if the Senator from New York will explain the amendment. I think it is a very important amendment, and one which should not be adopted without full information on the part of the Senate as to just what it proposes.

Mr. WAGNER. Mr. President, under the bill as it is now pending the so-called Costigan-La Follette bill, the apportionment of 40 per cent of the amount authorized to be appropriated is according to the census of population. I propose to change the basis of the apportionment of that 40 per cent so that it may be according to the census of unemployment. The purpose of the bill is to relieve distress among the unemployed, and in order to do that it is not necessary to apportion it according to population.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. WAGNER. Yes.

Mr. FLETCHER. I am afraid we are getting into a field where we shall be all at sea, because I do not understand that there is any official census of unemployment up to date, and I doubt if there is any such census in any State.

Mr. WAGNER. I may say to the Senator that there was an official census of unemployment taken at the same time that the census of population was taken in 1930, which is an official document in the records of the Census Bureau.

Mr. JONES and Mr. BORAH addressed the Chair.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from New York yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. WAGNER. I yield first to the Senator from Washington.

Mr. JONES. As I understand, the Senator's proposition is based upon the census of unemployment of 1930.

Mr. WAGNER. Yes.

Mr. JONES. I hope the Senator will appreciate the fact that the conditions in reference to unemployment in the western section of the country, at any rate, were far different at that time from what they are now, and probably that is true in other sections of the country. The acute condition with reference to unemployment in my section of the country has occurred since 1930, and I think it would be very unjust to that portion of the country if the amendment of the Senator from New York were adopted.

Mr. WAGNER. Mr. President, there has been, of course, an increase in unemployment since the census of 1930 was taken. I have a communication from the head of the statistical bureau of the Department of Commerce, which is in touch with unemployment statistics such as are now being collected. That communication shows that in the industrial sections of the country there has been a larger increase in unemployment than in what may be called the rural or agricultural sections. So, if anything, the necessity for relief in the industrial sections, where the greatest degree of unemployment exists, even according to the statistics of unemployment for 1930 is out of proportion to the need elsewhere.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Kentucky?

Mr. WAGNER. Yes.

Mr. BARKLEY. The Senator will recall that as the result of the census of 1930 it was given out officially that there were only about two and a half million people unemployed in the United States, when everybody knew there were between five and six millions unemployed. Not only were the figures which were given out, based upon the census, inaccurate, but the proportions which were given out as to the total number of unemployed were not accurate and failed to show the real situation. They might likewise fail to show the proportion of unemployed. Later, from an entirely different source, the Secretary of Commerce announced that there were some six million men unemployed.

Mr. WAGNER. That was a year later.

Mr. BARKLEY. That was a year later, but the estimate was based on the census figures of 1930 and was therefore official in that sense. I am afraid if we adopt as a basis a more or less flexible and moving figure as to unemployment, which is always changing, that we are likely to do injustice to some communities, whereas the census of population is fixed, and on it as a criterion, heretofore all our legislation for the distribution of Federal funds has been based.

Mr. WAGNER. Mr. President, there have been quite a number of errors made also in taking the census of population.

Mr. BARKLEY. But generally it is recognized as about the best census we can get.

Mr. WAGNER. The census of unemployment was taken by the same machinery and the same methods which were employed in taking the census of population.

Mr. BARKLEY. They were more anxious to get all the people listed than they were to list the unemployed as unemployed.

Mr. WAGNER. If the Senator had had an opportunity to study the records of unemployment which have been published since the taking of the unemployment census of 1930, he would be persuaded that in the industrial sections, where in 1930 unemployment existed to a large extent, the increase has been even larger in proportion to the unemployed in other sections of the country where conditions are not so acute.

Mr. BARKLEY. The only trouble about the Senator's plan is that it proposes what seems to me to be a shifting basis for the distribution of this large sum of money.

Mr. WAGNER. If we intend to relieve real unemployment we have got to go where the distress is greatest. There is no doubt that that is very distinctly reflected by the census of 1930, together with the expert opinion that the ratio has kept about the same except that unemployment has increased somewhat in the urban sections of the country.

Now, let me give an illustration which I think will be persuasive on the proposition of the inequality of the distribution of the pending bill.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. WAGNER. May I give the illustration first? There are a number, and I will point out this one.

Here is the State of Rhode Island, and here is the State of South Dakota. They have practically the same population. I think the population of South Dakota is slightly larger than that of Rhode Island. Under the 1930 census, Rhode Island had about 35,000 unemployed, which has increased since. I am using only approximate figures. In the State of South Dakota, on the other hand, the unemployment was a little over 3,000; yet under the apportionment provided for in this legislation those two States will receive exactly the same amount of relief, although there is nine or ten times as much unemployment and distress in the State of Rhode Island as there is in the State of South Dakota.

Throughout you can find any number of instances. New York under the 1930 census had an unemployment of a little over 13 per cent of all of the unemployed in the United States. Under the apportionment by population it will receive about 10 per cent.

Illinois in 1930 had 9 per cent of the unemployed in the United States, but receives but 6 per cent under the apportionment provided for in the pending bill.

Massachusetts had 5 per cent of the Nation's unemployed, and receives only a little over 3 per cent of aid under this bill if apportioned according to population.

So I could go on with instance after instance to indicate that this bill does not distribute the funds so as to relieve the unemployment situation. I think the unemployment census would be a fairer method of distribution.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, the principle for which the Senator from New York is contending seems to me to be a sound one; but I do not regard the census of 1930 as a correct or fair basis for such distribution. At that time the storm had not really struck. The situation had not developed in any sense whatever. To go back two years and take figures which were gathered under the circumstances under which they were gathered at that time as a basis for distribution I do not think would carry out the principles for which the Senator is contending. I should like to see this money distributed according to needs, but I am reasonably sure that the census of 1930 will not effectuate that.

Mr. WAGNER. Mr. President, there has been considerable shifting in population since the census was taken, and yet we are going to rely upon the census of 1930. There has been a shift in most cases; but I am looking for the letter that I had put into the RECORD from the head of the bureau which collects these statistics, who, after a thorough examination, wrote me to the effect that the ratio, even considering the unemployment situation to-day, is about the same as it was in 1930, except that if it has been intensified at all it has been in the urban sections, in the industrial sections of the country.

Mr. BORAH. The trouble with that is that the people who are writing those letters are more familiar with the industrial portion of the country, and they are less familiar than they ought to be with the other portion of the country. I do not think anyone can give a just comparison based upon the 1930 census.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, the object which the bill seeks to accomplish, and the one which the Senator from New York seeks to accomplish by his amendment, is a rapid distribution of a portion of the funds for relief in order to get the money into the various communities in time to be of service in this critical emergency.

I admit that the population census is not an ideal basis upon which to predicate the 40 per cent apportionment provided in the bill. However, I also agree with the statement made by the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] that this economic storm did not strike all parts of the country with equal intensity at the same time. The unemployment census of 1930 was taken only about six months after the stock-market crash and after the acceleration of the process of deflation and unemployment began.

I think the Senate also should be informed that the unemployment census itself has been under the most serious criticism from disinterested statisticians, as well as those who participated in advising the Census Bureau concerning the methods of its being taken. I quote from Miss Mary van Kleeck, one of the best known and one of the ablest statisticians in the United States. She is connected with the Russell Sage Foundation.

On page 513 of the hearings held by the Manufactures Committee on the bill to establish an economic council there appears this criticism from Miss van Kleeck of the statistical accuracy of the 1930 unemployment census:

From the moment when the first preliminary returns were announced on June 26—

That is, 1930—

The census has been challenged. The New York State industrial commissioner called them premature and not designed "to give a true picture." In so far as New York State was concerned, they gave too great weight to rural areas. Moreover, to give the percentage in terms of the aggregate population was not a significant figure. The important fact was the percentage of the wage-earning population, and it would have been better to have withheld the figures a month or two for more complete data.

Some newspaper and magazine comment was particularly severe. The New York World, on July 11, 1930, said, "The Department of Commerce is again offending common sense by putting forth alleged figures of unemployment." The New Republic, on August 20, commented on the "attempt [of the Census Bureau] to minimize the number of the unemployed," and even concluded that "it is impossible not to infer that the administration was glad to have the underestimates pass as good currency."

The resignation of Dr. Charles E. Persons from his position as expert on unemployment in the Census Bureau brought to light his view of what he regarded as inadequacy in counting the unemployed. In a signed article in the New York World, he objected to the impression given that data for the jobless only gave a fair measure of unemployment and he made a number of other criticisms of the validity of deductions from the areas included in preliminary announcements, the scanty representation of industrial States in the first returns, and an overestimate of the proportion of the total population included in this sample. He held that all of these factors reduced the total estimate of the unemployment.

A former Commissioner of Labor Statistics, Dr. Royal Meeker, issued a statement which concluded:

"A careful analysis of this first census report [of August 23] indicates that while the figures are probably correct, they invite misunderstanding and have been grossly misinterpreted because of the narrow limited definition of unemployment used in the census. Those who use these statistics should know what they mean."

These criticisms are cited to show the importance of a clear analysis now of the whole procedure of the Bureau of the Census in taking the census of unemployment and in compiling the results.

I cite his statement as an indication that the unemployment census of 1930 is not the ideal basis upon which to predicate the distribution of 40 per cent of the funds provided under the bill that it would seem to be when first presented.

While I admit in conclusion, as I did at the outset, that neither base is perfect, I think that after due and careful consideration there is much to be said for the population base rather than the base of the unemployment census of 1930, in view of the statistical criticisms of it, and in view of the further fact that it is more than 2 years old.

Mr. WAGNER. Mr. President, may I remind the Senator that in the case I cited, that of Rhode Island and South Dakota, where the population is the same, and I think it will be generally conceded that there is a difference of about nine to one in the unemployment situation, under the bill as the Senator proposes it the apportionment will be exactly the same in those two States.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I admit the example cited is a compelling argument; but, on the other hand, I point out to the Senator and to the Senate that if the unemployment census of 1930 is taken as the base, while I can not at this moment furnish examples of unfairness in that distribution, I am satisfied, in view of the criticism of the statistics taken by the Census Bureau, and in view of the further fact that this unemployment wave has swept into other communities since the census was taken, that if the Senator's base is taken for the distribution, many States which did not have much unemployment as shown by the census in 1930 are now undoubtedly suffering from a large number of unemployed.

In other words, may I say to the Senator that I am in hearty accord with the objective of trying to get this money into the various Commonwealths on the basis of relieving the burden of unemployment; but, at the same time, I wanted to point out and to have the Senate understand that there would not be an equitable distribution under the plan suggested by the Senator.

Mr. WAGNER. May I say to the Senator that the criticism which was made upon the census of unemployment of 1930 was that in the industrial sections, the very sections which then suffered and now suffer, there were not the proper precautions taken to secure a full account of the unemployed. I remember that at the time I directed criticisms at the method of taking the census; but it was in the industrial sections of the country where the failure was greatest, and it was at that census, thus taken, that the criticism was directed.

May I take the time to read just a portion of a letter which was sent to me by Mr. J. Frederick Dewhirst, who is the acting chief of the division of economic research of the Department of Commerce, in which he says——

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, may I ask what is the date of the letter?

Mr. WAGNER. The letter is dated February 3 of this year.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. 1932?

Mr. WAGNER. Yes.

Mr. Dewhirst says:

MY DEAR SENATOR: This is in reply to your letter of February 2, requesting my opinion regarding the distribution of unemployment in the States. As you know, there are no current statistics which would make it possible to give an exact quantitative measurement of the amount of unemployment in each State.

My own judgment is, however, that the increase in unemployment which has occurred since the time of the census has fallen most heavily in those States in which unemployment was shown to be most severe in April, 1930. In other words, if the States were ranked according to the severity of unemployment existing in each, my belief is that the ranking would be much the same as at the time of the census, but that the disparity of "spread" between those States with the lowest percentage of unemployment and those with the largest percentage would be greater now than in April, 1930.

This conclusion is based upon an examination of the distribution of unemployment as reported in the census of 1930 and a study of the employment indexes published by the Bureau of Labor Statistics. The States in which the percentage of gainfully occupied in classes A and B combined was greatest were also those States which are predominantly industrial in character, and it is precisely from these occupations (i. e., manufacturing, mining, and construction, as well as railroads) that the largest numbers have been laid off since April, 1930. The increase in unemployment has been relatively less severe in the more widely distributed mercantile and service occupations and in agriculture, so that it would seem that the nonindustrial States have experienced a somewhat less pronounced increase of unemployment.

Another factor which would tend to cause a relatively greater increase of unemployment in the States which already had a large percentage of unemployment in April, 1930, is that these States, such as Michigan, Illinois, Massachusetts, Pennsylvania, Rhode Island, New York, etc., are largely urban in character, with large cities into which the casual unemployed labor from the rural sections tends to drift in midwinter. Of course, this is merely stating what is generally recognized by students of the subject—that unemployment is largely an industrial and urban phenomena.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. WAGNER. I yield.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. That was the view I had of the matter, that so far as the census reports are concerned it is an urban proposition. Can the Senator tell us how, in an agricultural community, a determination is made as to whether a man is unemployed or is not unemployed?

Mr. WAGNER. I suppose the same question was directed to him that was directed to a resident of any other section of the country. He was asked to answer certain questions, which determined his status.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. How would a question be directed to a farmer as to whether he belonged to the unemployed or employed class?

Mr. WAGNER. That depends on whether he was employed or not.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. He is never employed except on his farm, and just at the time the question was asked he was not doing anything. It was the season when he was not doing anything except feeding his stock. In other words, when we speak about unemployment we have reference to wage earners. Unquestionably the census refers to wage earners.

Mr. WAGNER. And the suffering to-day is among the wage earners, who are without work, who wish to work, and can not secure work.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. The Senator is not able to speak from very intimate personal acquaintance with the farming sections of the West, at least, or he would not say so.

Mr. WAGNER. I am certainly as anxious as is the Senator from Montana to relieve hardship wherever it may be, whether it be in an agricultural section or in an urban section, but I am talking simply on the question of apportioning this fund where the greatest need for relief exists, and I think that is where men are unemployed, with nowhere to go, with no farms, with no place to get food except the bread line, who want to work, but who, because of our present economic depression, can not find employment.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I am very sure the Senator is desirous of assisting all who need assistance, but I submit that his plan of distribution would really be eminently unfair to the agricultural sections, where there is great need and great suffering, where the census of unemployment would really show no considerable amount of unemployment—that is to say, no great number of wage earners who are out of jobs.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, carrying out the thought expressed by the Senator from Montana, I am sure that there are States—and I represent one of them—where the number of unemployed in the farming sections, people walking the roads hunting positions in which they might be employed, is greater by incalculable numbers than ever before in the history of at least our State. That is true, according to the information I get, in practically every agricultural State in the Union. So that it would not be just to apportion this fund according to the census taken in 1930, which was the result largely of an investigation in industrial centers, leaving out of the calculation entirely the distressing condition of the unemployed in the purely agricultural sections of our States.

I do not know but that the provision in the bill now under consideration, if it should become law, would mean a more equitable distribution of the money than an attempt to apportion it according to the census of 1930.

All of us are familiar with the methods by which a census is taken, and we know that it is almost impossible to get a correct census of the unemployed in the rural communities at this time, because this is the first time in the history of agriculture that I know anything about when such a condition as this has existed, and the distress now existing is nothing short of a phenomenon. Such a condition never existed before that I know of, at least in anything like the proportion that now obtains.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, taking the report on unemployment, classes A and B of the fifteenth decennial census, and turning to page 18 of volume 1, it appears, for purposes of illustration, that the State of Arkansas had a population of 1,854,482; that the number of gainful workers was reported as 667,870; persons out of employment, able to work and looking for labor, who comprise class A, numbered 12,820, or seven-tenths of 1 per cent of the population. The number embraced in class B was 5,531, or three-tenths of 1 per cent of the population.

The number of gainful workers out of employment in that State in class A, according to the census referred to, was seven-tenths of 1 per cent of the population; and the percentage of gainful workers embraced in class B, embracing persons laid off without pay, is eight-tenths of 1 per cent.

Upon the basis which the amendment provides, therefore, the amount that would be allotted to the State of Arkansas would be inconsiderable. I have not yet had an opportunity to make a calculation, but it would amount to very little, and would afford no substantial measure of assistance.

I must say that where an appropriation is made for the relief of unemployment, to my mind unquestionably the number of unemployed is the correct standard; but the question very naturally arises whether the census of 1930, which it is contemplated by the amendment shall be used, constitutes an accurate basis of arriving at the number of unemployed.

In no State that does not embrace large industrial centers would the 1930 census show any considerable number of unemployed, and therefore practically all of the fund appropriated would be available for the large industrial centers.

It is important in this connection also to point out the fact that while these industrial centers undoubtedly have the problem of unemployment very greatly accentuated and emphasized under present conditions, it is also well to bear in mind that the industrial centers are also centers of wealth, as well as of unemployment, and that they are abler to sustain their own burden of unemployment than are the communities where industrial activities are comparatively small.

I merely point out those figures for the consideration of the Senate.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, a few days ago in the course of the debate it was stated upon the floor of the Senate that the mayor of Frederick, Md., when interviewed as to whether or not his city needed the proposed assistance, had stated that it did need it, and that he would be glad to have it. Inasmuch as that is in the RECORD, I would like to read a telegram which I have received from the mayor of Frederick, Mr. Elmer F. Munshower. In the telegram he states:

I have been quoted in Baltimore Sun in editorial as favorable to Federal relief bill and needing same for Frederick. This is incorrect, as I advised committee in questionnaire we did not need relief, as Frederick, through local agencies, is taking care of the unemployed splendidly.

As far as I know, no Maryland town or city has asked for this assistance. Inasmuch as Mr. Munshower has been pictured as asking for it, I ask that this telegram be given consideration.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, may I just say, in this connection, that I have looked the matter up since it was referred to, and I find that in answering the questionnaire the mayor answered the seventh question in the affirmative; that is, for Federal aid.

Mr. BROOKHART. Mr. President, a few days ago the Senator from Ohio [Mr. FESS] took considerable time in explaining the difference in principle between appropriating money by taxation of cities or States for this kind of relief, and appropriating it from the National Treasury. I do not know whether he got the matter explained satisfactorily or not, but I received an explanation this morning which I think is quite satisfactory.

A citizen of Illinois residing in the city of Chicago states that Mr. Silas H. Strawn, president of the United States Chamber of Commerce, who is so strongly opposed to this Federal relief, or "dole," as he calls it, pays $120 personal tax under the laws of Illinois locally in Chicago, but he pays more than $40,000 income tax into the United States Treasury. Therefore it is a vastly different matter in principle with Mr. Strawn to have the money appropriated by the Federal Government than to have it appropriated by the State of Illinois. His proportionate share would be only about three hundred times more if it were paid by the Federal Government, and, of course, that makes a vast difference in principle.

Mr. KEAN. Mr. President, I desire to have printed in the RECORD a protest of certain taxpayers of New Jersey against the Costigan-La Follette bill.

There being no objection, the matter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

CLEMENTON, N. J., February 14, 1932.

Hon. HAMILTON F. KEAN,

United States Senate Office Building, Washington, D. C.:

A representative cross section of the citizens of Camden County strongly disapprove the enactment of the communistic Costigan-La Follette seven hundred and fifty million dole from the Federal Treasury to the States. No self-respecting State governing body should think of imposing further burdens upon the Federal taxpayers who will be called upon to make up the appalling national deficit necessary to balance the Budget, protect and safeguard investments in Government securities, the very bone and sinew of our entire financial structure. Governor Moore and the people of New Jersey are at work on the problem, and you may be assured that it will never be said of the State or its people that they failed in the discharge of the duty they owe to humanity in distress. Ten per cent at least of any such fund created would be spent by the Federal agency created to administer it. We are overrun and annoyed now by the army of Federal snoopers and "wise guys" to the point of open revolt. The people are aroused as never before in this generation. They want work; they demand that the cost of government be reduced; they lack confidence in the ability of our political leaders and statesmen. They have unsheathed their tomahawks and scalping knives. Every Federal nation-wide activity except those dealing with finance, health, and law enforcement should be drastically curtailed or discontinued entirely. It is a sad commentary on the simple social justice of a democracy when the personnel and salaries of Federal employees are maintained upon a high-prosperity basis while the common people are denied the right to work, while their homes are being sold for taxes and their families devoid of the bare necessities of life. The Republican Party is on trial. It can not escape the responsibility for this political economic outrage. I am a Republican, but I join with every other straight-thinking, patriotic American in commendation and approval of the courageous two-fisted statement of Congressman CRISP on the tax problem, however distasteful the subject of tax increases may be. We at least have the facts and know the worst and can prepare to do our part. Thank you.

C. L. BARDO,
President New Jersey Taxpayers' Association.

Mr. KEAN. Mr. President, I also desire to have printed in the RECORD a resolution adopted by the State Highway Commission of New Jersey asking that $125,000,000 be appropriated for road construction.

There being no objection, the matter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Be it resolved by the State Highway Commission of the State of New Jersey, That the Congress of the United States be requested to make a special appropriation of $125,000,000 for Federal aid to the States in road construction, the funds to be used in the same manner as in 1931, when advance appropriations were made to the several States to help relieve the unemployment situation.

I hereby certify the above to be a true copy of a resolution adopted by the State highway commission at its meeting held February 9, 1932.

A. LEE GROVER, Secretary.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, in speaking about the bill on Thursday last I made the statement that I understood there were only two States which had not already made some provision for their unemployed. One of those exceptions was my own State of Pennsylvania, where an act had been passed by the legislature making an appropriation for distress within Pennsylvania, but the act had been tied up in litigation and consequently was thus far inapplicable. I am very happy to be able to say to the Senate that this morning the common pleas court decided that this act is constitutional and therefore the appropriation made by it can now be paid over to local communities for relief.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator from Pennsylvania what was the amount of the appropriation?

Mr. REED. Ten million dollars.

Mr. WAGNER. Mr. President, I do not want to prolong the discussion unduly, but I would like to invite the attention of the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] to these facts. Arkansas, under the census taken in 1930, had unemployment in classes A and B amounting to 18,351, which is six-tenths of 1 per cent of all the unemployed of the United States. Under the distribution of relief on the basis of population, Arkansas would receive 1.5 per cent.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, manifestly the figures of unemployment in that State, if reliable, are relatively very small under either standard. Of course it is inconceivable to me that under present conditions, in a State having a population of nearly 2,000,000, there should be only 18,000 persons unemployed. There probably are more persons unemployed within a single county in the State of Arkansas than the total number listed in the census as of 1930. I can not say with certainty that there has been a great increase in unemployment in that State since the census of 1930 was taken. The significance of the figures presented, so far as the State of Arkansas is concerned, is clear. The amount which that State would receive under either proposal would be very small.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, I would like to inquire of the Senator from New York if he has prepared a table showing the amount that would go to each State under the distribution plan proposed in the bill and under the distribution plan proposed in his amendment?

Mr. WAGNER. Not in amount; only in percentages.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, referring to the matter to which the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] has just called attention, is it not a fact, though the Senator from New York may not be advised of this, not living in that section, that in taking the unemployment census agriculturists, for instance, were not listed as unemployed, because they were out on their farms supposedly engaged in carrying on their operations. However, as a matter of fact, they are probably in greater distress because of drought conditions than those who are actually unemployed. That class of citizens was not listed as unemployed, but in all probability at that time were more direly in need of assistance than those who had had good jobs and were temporarily unemployed.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from New York. [Putting the question.] The noes seem to have it. The noes have it, and the amendment is rejected.

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. President, is it in order to offer an amendment to the substitute at this time?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Not at this time. Are there further amendments to the original text?

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Mr. President, a few moments ago I sent to the desk an amendment to the original bill. The amendment is now upon the desk of the Presiding Officer. In the consideration of the question before us we find some five or six different proposals. If I may have the attention of those who are sponsors of the different proposals, I present my amendment in the nature of a compromise. The amendment has not been distributed to Senators. I ask unanimous consent that the pages may furnish copies to those who desire copies.

The VICE PRESIDENT. That order will be made.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. It occurs to me that we should have a picture of the issues now presented to the Senate. The LaFollette-Costigan bill provides an authorization in the sum of $375,000,000 for the purpose of direct aid to the States. This bill carries an amendment offered by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] authorizing an appropriation in the sum of $375,000,000 for the purpose of constructing roads. So the bill now carries authorizations in the total sum of $750,000,000.

When the La Follette-Costigan bill is completed we will then have submitted to the Senate an amendment in the form of a substitute proposed by the Senator from Alabama [Mr. BLACK], the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH], and the Senator from Ohio [Mr. BULKLEY]. This substitute likewise carries total authorizations in the sum of $750,000,000. The first part of the authorization is in the sum of $375,000,000 for the purpose of building roads. That is already taken care of in the Norris amendment to the La Follette bill. The second proposal in the Black-Walsh-Bulkley substitute is for $375,000,000 to be loaned to the States so that in turn the States may supply and distribute the money to the counties and other subdivisions of the State. It occurs to me that if the Congress desires to furnish money to aid the people in distress, there is no occasion for having to go through the several States in order to reach those we have in mind. If we expect to provide aid direct to the people, we may just as well accept the La Follette-Costigan proposal and get the money into their hands before they starve.

If the La Follette-Costigan bill is not amended by the adoption of the substitute just mentioned, there will then be proposed a second amendment in the form of a substitute by the distinguished Senator from New York [Mr. WAGNER]. His proposal likewise carries an authorization for $750,000,000. The first part of the authorization is for road construction and the second part is for aid to the people. So in substance the La Follette-Costigan bill, as amended, carries the same proposal as does the amendment of the Senator from New York. The details of course, are different.

If the Wagner amendment should not be adopted, then there will be another one proposed by the distinguished Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS]. His proposal will authorize only $500,000,000. He would save the Government $250,000,000; but his amendment has for its purpose the relief of industry, and through industry relief to the people of the country who desire to work.

If that should be defeated, then the Senator from Michigan [Mr. COUZENS] will offer a proposal in the form of a substitute. He has cut the amount down to $375,000,000, and this sum is to be given the President to be used as the President may see proper.

Mr. President, there is sufficient interest in this matter to get some legislation out of the several proposals. There are two distinct proposals pending before the Senate: First, aid for the people of the country to-day who are hungry and who are cold; second, there is a proposal pending to give aid to the unemployed in the form of work.

The amendment submitted by myself does not materially change the La Follette-Costigan proposal. The only change is a slight change in the authorization. It accepts the Norris amendment. Then it incorporates the substance of the Wagner Act passed during the last Congress.

If we remember for a moment, during the last session we had two bills introduced and sponsored by the distinguished junior Senator from New York [Mr. WAGNER]. One of those bills was passed by the Congress and signed by the President. Under that act a special commission has been working all summer with the departments of the Government devising plans to give work to the needy and unemployed. Their report is now pending before the Senate. It embraces proposals in the form of public works which the departments want—proposals like highway construction, as covered by the amendment of the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS], river and harbor improvements, flood control, public buildings—projects that the Government would desire to see constructed if and when funds are available.

At this time I will ask that my proposal be read. I ask that the clerk read the first paragraph, which is a duplicate of the authorization in the La Follette-Costigan bill. It does not change the substance, but changes slightly the form.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the clerk will read, as requested.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Strike out section 2 of Title I and section 1 of Title II, and insert in lieu of section 2 of Title I the following:

"SEC. 2. There is hereby authorized to be appropriated the sum of $1,000,000,000, to be immediately available, for purposes as follows:

"(a) Such sums as may be necessary in carrying into effect the provisions under Title I, not exceeding $375,000,000 for allocation to the several States by the Federal Emergency Relief Board created by section 3 in the manner hereinafter provided. Not more than $125,000,000 of this amount shall be expended in the fiscal year ending June 30, 1932."

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Mr. President, that does not modify the substance of the bill pending before us so far as authorization is concerned. The second subdivision covers the authorization under the Norris amendment and transfers it at this point, so I will not have it read, because it is simply a copy of the Norris authorization transferring same from section 1 of title 2 to subdivision (b) of section 2 of title 1.

Subdivision (c) authorizes an appropriation of $250,000,000 to start work under the terms of the Wagner Act passed last year. I want to address myself to the Members on this side of the aisle for a moment. During the past summer, after we learned that the President had vetoed the second Wagner bill, Democratic Members of this body saw fit to criticize the President. Democratic Members of the House saw fit to criticize the President for vetoing the Wagner bill. The Democratic press criticized the President for vetoing the Wagner bill. Criticism was quite general among Democrats and likewise among many Republicans. Now, we have an authorization to carry into effect the terms of the first Wagner proposal. Surveys have been made, projects have been approved, and the plan is before us. The departments of Government want to begin the work, but can not get the money. The authorization carried in my amendment proposes $250,000,000 to start to do the things which have been approved and which await only the funds to cover costs of construction. The special point in the amendment offered authorizes appropriations to start the work of carrying into effect the provisions of the Wagner Act.

Before consideration of the matter is concluded we will have a vote as to whether we are going to sustain the Wagner Act or whether we desire to repeal it. A vote against an authorization of funds to start work under the act will have the effect of virtually repealing the law.

I will now ask the clerk to read paragraph (c) of the authorization proposal.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. WALSH of Montana in the chair). Without objection, the clerk will read, as requested.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

(c) The sum of $250,000,000 for carrying into effect the provisions under Title III for initiating and developing the program of public construction work set forth in the report of the Federal Employment Stabilization Board, entitled "Preliminary Report of 6-Year Federal Planning Program for Construction, Repairs, and Alterations," and dated January 20, 1932: Provided, That any unused portion of funds authorized under (a) and (b) may be appropriated and used in carrying into effect the provisions under Title III, and such sums shall be in addition to the allocation in this subdivision (c).

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Mr. President, I have added a new proposal to the pending bill and designated it as Title III. Title III is a copy of the resolution now pending before the Senate, submitted by the Senator from New York [Mr. WAGNER]. I will ask that it may be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the Secretary will read, as requested.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

TITLE III

SECTION 1. The President, the Federal Employment Stabilization Board, the Director of the Bureau of the Budget, and the construction agencies as defined in the Federal employment stabilization act (46 Stat. 1084) are severally requested to exercise the authority conferred upon them by said act to the end that supplemental estimates of public-works emergency appropriations in an amount as provided in subdivision (c) of section 2 of Title I may at the earliest possible time be transmitted to Congress pursuant to such act so that an emergency public-works program may be inaugurated and the policy of Congress declared in such act may be effectuated.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Mr. President, in the latter part of the proposal are some minor amendments that would naturally follow in the event this proposal should be agreed to. The proposal, which is in the nature of a compromise, is nothing more nor less than this: It accepts the La Follette-Costigan bill as it is, thus providing relief for those in distress. It then accepts the Norris amendment authorizing $375,000,000 for road-construction purposes, of which some $125,000,000 is to be available the first year. That has already been agreed to.

Then, sir, I propose a more liberal internal-improvement program, carrying out the terms of existing law and putting into effect the construction of the identical projects which are desired by members of the Cabinet, such as public buildings, Army housing, hospitals for veterans, hospitals for Indians, the identical projects for which the several Cabinet members have asked the Budget Bureau for money. The proposal follows the regular procedure, carries out provisions of existing law, and is not radical. We are going to enter upon those projects anyway, just as soon as we can get the money. If we can get the money now we can erect these buildings and improvements to-day cheaper than we can erect them next year, perhaps. Then we will have the improvements, and their construction will serve the same purpose as direct appropriations for relief, because these public works will be scattered throughout the country and the money will find its way into the hands of the great mass of people, enabling them to earn wages which they will spend for clothing, for fuel, and for food.

I contend, Mr. President, that it is much better for the Congress to appropriate a million dollars and to give $1 apiece to a million men than to appropriate a million dollars and give it all to one man. The million men with $1 apiece will spend that money to-day buying things which they now need. They will make business better at the little stores throughout the country; they will make business better for the big stores in the cities; they will make business for the wholesalers, and business for the factories of the country. The railroads must carry the goods back and forth; that will make business for the railroads; an increased demand will arise for farmers' produce; and all the time the banks will be getting the benefit of this trade and commerce.

At this point I want to call attention to one or two statements in support of what I have to say. Last summer William Randolph Hearst made a radio address. I quote from that address. He was talking first about Mr. Hoover's program of public improvements. Mr. Hearst said:

> When Mr. Hoover was a candidate for the Presidency he won many to his support by the magnificent program of public improvements which he described as the main feature of his policy.
>
> This program was comprehensive and complete, including highways, waterways, flood control, and water-power conservation.
> It covered every part of the country and embraced the inland waterways of the East, the Columbia River development of the Northwest, the water and power dams of the Southwest, and a gigantic plan for both flood control and water and power conservation on the Mississippi River and its tributaries.

Later on he mentions roads and public internal improvements.

So at that time Mr. Hoover was in favor of a program of internal public improvements.

I desire to quote a brief paragraph from one of his speeches. In his address of acceptance—and I am quoting from a book entitled "The New Day," pages 21 and 22. The paragraph is headed "Expense no Obstacle":

> Objection has been made that this program, as laid down by the party platform, may require that several hundred million dollars of capital be advanced by the Federal Government without obligation upon the individual farmer.

He was speaking there, of course, to farm relief; and that is explained in the next sentence:

> With that objection I have little patience. A nation which is spending $90,000,000,000 a year can well afford an expenditure of a few hundred millions for a workable program that will give to one-third of its population their fair share of the Nation's prosperity. Nor does this proposal put the Government into business, except so far as it is called upon to furnish capital with which to build up the farmer to the control of his own destinies.

Then only recently the president of one of the big railroads of this country, Mr. Willard, is reported to have made a speech in Pennsylvania. I wish to quote briefly from that speech. He was speaking about this identical problem now pending before the Senate—the question of wages for the unemployed; the question of help for those who need it most. He said:

> I can think of nothing more deplorable than the condition of a man, able and axious to work, with no resources but his labor and perhaps with others even more helpless dependent upon him.
> Unless he is willing to starve and see those who justly look to him for support also starve, his only alternative is to seek charity, and, failing in that, to steal. And while I do not like to say so, I would be less candid if I did not say that in such circumstances I would steal before I would starve.

Mr. President, in further support of the statements I have just made, I desire to read from an address delivered by the former Governor of New York State. In a syndicated article of date August 10 former Gov. Alfred E. Smith said:

> Unemployment has now taken on the aspect of a real emergency.
> Private charity and voluntary relief will not solve the problem throughout the coming winter.
> If we double public construction, we shall go a long way toward providing work for our unemployed.

Mr. President, at this point I want to read from a magazine which came to me this morning. This publication is entitled "American Monthly," February issue, 1932. On page 11 I find an article entitled "Washington Spotlights," and under that title I read the following:

> As to the effects of the moves already made by the administration, it is probable that they will improve business conditions and help the stock market for a few weeks—say through February. Then will come the customary seasonal spring upturn in March, which will run at least three or four weeks. That will bring the country up to April. Then will come the test—will the business improvement continue or will the artificial stimulation have worn itself out by that time?
> The fear of most of the experts here is the latter. They are not optimistic about business prospects next summer and autumn.
> This fear, in turn, may force the administration to reverse its policy of opposition to the unemployment relief bills of Senator WAGNER, of New York, and Senator LA FOLLETTE, of Wisconsin, providing huge public-building programs. If those bills are passed and new Federal money is thus injected into business channels, both through the increased purchasing power of the 8,000,000 unemployed and through the direct governmental purchase of building materials, the prospects for economic revival between now and election will be much better.

Mr. President, this bill can be made into a relief measure not only for those who are hungry and cold to-day but also for the country generally. I do not believe that the laws already passed by this Congress are destined to help very greatly the folks who are in real distress. I think the amendment which I have proposed will take care of those who to-day are needy, who are hungry, and who are cold. It will take care of a construction program embracing roads and embracing those projects which the Government itself wants to construct.

If the authorization can be passed in the sum of $1,000,000,000 it does not mean that a billion dollars is to be appropriated immediately. Even under the provision of the La Follette bill authorizing an appropriation of $375,000,000 for direct help, before the money can be forthcoming a bill must be introduced in regular form and reported by the Committee on Appropriations, and unless that committee can be shown that the entire amount is needed I have confidence that it will not appropriate the entire sum, but it will have the authority and the power to recommend the appropriation of such sums immediately as in its wisdom it may see proper. That would be a sum necessary to take care of the actual distress that is existing throughout the country.

Then under the Norris amendment a highway program can be gotten under way.

Under the amendment I have proposed, providing an authorization of $250,000,000 more, the departments can submit to Congress requests for money with which to build the structures they have been and are asking now.

My proposal, Mr. President, does not necessarily mean appropriation of a billion dollars; it might not take such a vast sum of money to render assistance to those who are needy and who require help. The balance of the sum authorized would be available for construction of public works already planned and surveyed. The machinery would be provided and available, so that if times should get worse before spring or before the Congress shall adjourn we would have the machinery in the hands of the Government with the estimates made, and all Congress would have to do would be to make the appropriations. The departments would have their surveys and would know exactly what they wanted to do and could start immediately putting men to work.

I notice in a newspaper of yesterday, Mr. President, I think a New York newspaper, under very heavy headlines, these words:

Thirty governors back war on depression. Many mayors also pledge aid to national job appeal of the Legion and other groups. Drive to start to-morrow.

That is to-day. The drive is on.

Another headline:

But some units have already begun a canvass to obtain work for a million men.

Mr. President, here are 30 governors and many mayors not asking in this news story for money to furnish to the helpless and the distressed but asking for money with which to begin public improvements to give a million men work. In addition to the La Follette authorization, and in addition to the Norris authorization, I propose a third authorization to do this identical thing.

If in order I offer formally this amendment in the form of a compromise and ask that it be pending.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, may I say to the Senator from Oklahoma that the parliamentary situation requires that any amendments to be made in the nature of perfecting amendments to the pending bill must be disposed of before the vote can come on the substitute. Therefore, if the Senator desires to offer this amendment to the pending bill before the vote is had upon the substitute proposed by the Senator from Alabama, the Senator from Montana, and the Senator from Ohio, it will be necessary for him to take a determination on that question at this time.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Mr. President, I realize the parliamentary situation; but inasmuch as I had no chance to get this proposal before the Senate until to-day, I have had no chance to confer with any of the proponents of the several amendments submitted. I should like to ask the distinguished Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] if he has any objections to the incorporation of this amendment as a part of the text of his bill.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I may say to the Senator that I am in accord with all that he has said concerning the advisability of expanding the public-works program. However, I believe that the critical emergency character of the relief situation is such that it is not advisable to jeopardize a determination of the issue involved concerning direct relief by attempting also to link with it and to join in that determination the question of enlarging the public-works program.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. WALSH of Montana in the chair). Will the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the occupant of the chair until a statement can be made concerning the parliamentary situation?

The amendment offered by the Senator from Oklahoma is an amendment to the original bill, and in due course should now be disposed of, being the only amendment pending to the original bill.

In view of the circumstances adverted to by the Senator from Oklahoma, however, the occupant of the chair suggests that the Senator from Oklahoma ask unanimous consent that a vote may be taken upon the matter at a later time, after consideration of amendments to the proposed substitute.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Mr. President, it is impossible to present a comprehensive amendment and have it considered for a few moments' time and get a vote that would really express the convictions of the Members. Because I do not want to have a vote on it now, I ask unanimous consent that the amendment may be considered pending to the La Follette proposal, to be called up later.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, may I say to the Senator that we can not make any progress in considering this legislation until the text of the pending bill is perfected and the substitute is disposed of. However, as I understand, if the substitute should not be agreed to, the Senator then would have an opportunity to offer his amendment to the pending bill; but the parliamentary situation, as I understand it, is such that unless the Senator's amendment to the pending bill is disposed of we can not proceed to vote upon the substitute.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will state that according to the custom of the Senate the amendments proposed to the original bill must first be disposed of; but, of course, by unanimous consent, that could remain in abeyance until some further progress is made concerning the perfection of the substitute.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I would not interpose an objection if the Senator asked unanimous consent that his amendment should be in order following a disposition of the substitute.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Let the occupant of the chair inquire of the Senator from Oklahoma if he accepts the suggestion of the Senator from Wisconsin that unanimous consent be requested that his amendment may be in order after the disposition of the substitutes offered.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. I ask unanimous consent that the compromise just proposed be considered as pending, to be called up later.

Mr. DILL. Mr. President, before that request is acted upon I should like to make a parliamentary inquiry.

Do I understand it to be the construction of the rule that after a substitute has been voted down no other substitute can be offered?

The VICE PRESIDENT. No. Other substitutes can be offered if one is voted down.

Mr. DILL. If the substitute offered here now is voted down, will not the Senator from Oklahoma have a right to offer his substitute?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The proposal of the Senator from Oklahoma is not a substitute for the whole bill.

Mr. DILL. Will he not have a right to offer his amendment, then? Are all amendments precluded when the substitute is voted down?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment of the Senator from Oklahoma is in order now.

Mr. DILL. But, I say, is not the bill always open to amendment if the substitute is voted down?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Yes; if the substitute is voted down, it is still open to amendment.

Mr. DILL. That is what I thought.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, in order to save the time of the Senate, instead of reading the amendment, I respectfully ask permission to have the amendment which I tendered printed in the RECORD.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, that order will be made.

The amendment is as follows:

Amendment intended to be proposed by Mr. LEWIS to the bill (S. 3045) to provide for cooperation by the Federal Government with the several States in relieving hardship and suffering caused by unemployment, and for other purposes, viz: Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert the following:

"That there shall be authorized from the Treasury of the United States the sum of no less than $500,000,000 to be credited to the manufacturers and employers of labor, industrial and agricultural, in the United States with the purpose and object of enabling said employers to resume the work of their industries and farms as may return to employment those who have been engaged or may be engaged in the line of occupation of the said industries of city or farm, the purpose of the said credit being that the merchants, manufacturers, or agriculturists may sell their produce to such establishments, domestic and foreign, as shall make such satisfactory contract with the producer as will enable the producer to serve the demands on credit of the purchaser for such length of time as under the circumstances as to the parties seem appropriate and practical.

"SEC. 2. That the object of the appropriation herein provided by the Government of the United States as credit to the merchants, manufacturers, and agriculturists is to extend only such sum as will be shown from proper examination to cover the exact losses of the producer so as to enable the producer to put forth the product without loss to himself, reserving the right to such profits as may be earned from the payment of such customers as shall contract for the supplies, the object of the appropriation herein provided being to offset the losses in order to enable the employers of labor to return the idle labor to employment and furnish work for the needy who are appealing for the privilege of toil in the different lines of industry and agriculture of the United States.

"SEC. 3. There shall be created at the instance and under the direction of the President of the United States such board comprised of officials of the Departments of the Treasury, Commerce, and Agriculture, who shall serve ex officio without additional salary to that now obtaining, who by this amendment are authorized to cause to be made an investigation of the demands of applicants for the credit provided herein and to adjudge and recommend to the Treasury Department the amount to be apportioned to the different applicants in order to ascertain and decide what sum would be just sufficient to cover the losses and for the board to be assured that the sum is advanced to those whose industries are opened to employment and which have put to work in quantity those fitted for the labor necessary to the industry. Said board shall have authority to pass upon and adjudge and recommend as to the qualification and worthiness of the applicant applying for credit and to investigate the good faith of the application and the fidelity of the undertakings and work professed in order that only those who open their plants or continue their plants and put to work the idle who are the objects being provided for under the provisions of this act.

"SEC. 4. That said board shall be authorized to take such security from those to whom credit is advanced as shall be satisfactory both in the quality of the security and the conditions under which it is issued, the security subject to being returned upon the payment by the manufacturer or agriculturist borrower of the amount of credit extended. Discretion is hereby conferred on the board as to the length of time each credit is to be afforded within the limits of the operation of this act.

"SEC. 5. It is hereby authorized and permitted that the security given by the customer, domestic or foreign, for goods or supplies of factory or farm may be accepted by the board as a portion or all of the security for the advance of credit given to the producer, and it is hereby authorized to the board at any time to have investigation made of the action and method of procedure of the business industry or undertaking to which credit has been advanced, in order to be assured honesty and good faith is being kept in continuing the work in distributing the supplies to legitimate debtors and establishing the employment at such proper rates and under such proper circumstances as labor under the supervision of unions or organizations protecting and guarding the same is now the practice or custom.

"SEC. 6. This act is to be designated as credit for the aid of the industries to afford employment, and is not to extend for a period of more than one year unless increased and continued by the act of Congress. This act shall go into effect immediately upon passage and approval, as required by law."

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I desire to ask my colleague a question. As I understand, the preliminary report of the Federal Employment Stabilization Board has been submitted.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. It is now on the President's desk.

Mr. GORE. And it recommends a number of projects in practically each of the several States.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. That is correct.

Mr. GORE. Aggregating all together something like a billion dollars.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Yes.

Mr. GORE. The pending bill, including the Senator's proposal, would authorize the appropriation of a billion dollars.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. That is correct.

Mr. GORE. I should like to ask my colleague if he has considered the advisability of preparing a substitute for all these pending measures which would embody the various and sundry recommendations contained in this preliminary report, so that all this money that is expended would bring something to the Government in return—that none of it would be a gratuity?

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Mr. President, replying to the inquiry, my substitute practically embodies that identical matter, for this reason: That part of the funds consumed by the LaFollette bill will decrease the billion dollars just that much.

Mr. GORE. Yes; but that is $375,000,000.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Yes. If that is all expended, that would still leave $625,000,000 to be expended for public works. The Norris amendment is nothing more nor less than an authorization to carry out one provision of this special report on highway construction.

Mr. GORE. Does the report contemplate as much as $375,000,000 for public highways in addition to the regular appropriation made for that purpose?

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. No; it does not. To that extent the Norris proposal goes farther than the recommendations in this special report submitted by the board. My amendment proposes that the part of the La Follette authorization not used for direct relief can go to carrying out this public-improvement program, and the part not used by the Norris authorization can likewise be used to carry out this public-improvement program; so, if this shall be agreed to, in my judgment there will be at least $750,000,000 available to build the things that the Government itself is now asking to be built as soon as it can get the money, and this proposal would authorize the appropriations. I think that answers the question.

Mr. GORE. It does; yes. What I was trying to get at is some plan by which the money that we spend can be devoted to public improvements, and that none of it should be in the nature of a gift or a gratuity.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. If my proposal should be accepted, the only part of the billion dollars that would be spent in the way of a gift or gratuity would be that part spent under the La Follette-Costigan bill; and, as I understand it, we are all practically agreed that if we have citizens to-day who are cold and hungry and starving and in need of medical supplies some means should be found to provide relief.

Mr. GORE. Unless work could be found for them.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Mr. President, I agree with the Senator entirely; but there is a certain class of our people that can not work. I have particular reference to the aged, the infirm, the widows, the orphans, and the sick. I think that some fund should be made available to take care of that particular class of our citizenship in sections where the local community, county, or State is unable to take care of them, or for any reason does not do so.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, I think possibly a misconception might arise from a part of the colloquy between the two Senators from Oklahoma.

The report made to the Senate by the Stabilization Board contemplates such work as is to be undertaken or recommended for acceptance during a period of six years—that is, six years from last year—and in that it is considered that there is authorized $125,000,000 a year for road construction, with a deduction of $16,000,000 per year—that is to say, one-fifth of the $80,000,000 emergency appropriation voted last year—for the first five years of that time. So that it may be considered, then, that there is a recommendation of $125,000,000 for six years, and authorizations have been made for two years only of the road construction program. So that really the La Follette bill, as it is amended by the Norris amendment and the substitute offered by the Senator from Alabama and the Senator from Ohio and myself, does not contemplate $375,000,000 in addition to the amount included in the report of the Stabilization Board.

Mr. NEELY. Mr. President, a single comforting generalization may be confidently deduced from the prolonged debate on the unemployment relief measures now before the Senate. That generalization is that in certain circumstances the United States Government may, by direct action, preserve and protect the lives of its citizens. Even the mailed champion of the opposition to Federal relief for the unemployed, the unclothed, and the unfed, the able chairman of the Republican National Committee and versatile senior Senator from Ohio—Doctor FESS—even he has reluctantly admitted that he would prefer Federal relief to actual starvation.

The able Senators from Colorado and Wisconsin [Mr. COSTIGAN and Mr. LA FOLLETTE] in their masterly discussions of their very comprehensive relief measure presented an overwhelming array of precedents and authority to justify the Congress in passing the pending bill. The eloquent Senator from Colorado supported his convincing argument with the Declaration of Independence, which proclaims that all men are endowed with the inalienable rights of life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness. He then proved, with the irresistibility of a mathematical demonstration, that the Costigan-La Follette bill is properly designed to preserve the most vital of this great trinity of blessings, namely, the right of life.

It has also been shown that the passage of the bill is explicitly approved by the preamble to the Constitution, which declares, among other things, that the Constitution is established to provide for the common defense and promote the general welfare. Can anyone think of a more effective or appropriate act of promoting the general welfare of a country than that of saving millions of its people from starving to death?

Let me point out another constitutional provision in favor of the bill. The first article contains the declaration that, "the Congress shall have the power to repel invasions." In this authority alone there is a firm foundation upon which to enact the humanitarian relief legislation now before us. At this hour, the entire country is invaded as it has never been invaded before. In the early days we were invaded on the east by British troops. In various wars foes have menaced both our northern and southern boundaries. But during the existence of the present nation-wide calamity, for the first time in our history, we have been simultaneously invaded from the north and the south, and the east and the west. This day, aye this very hour, our enemies are marching upon us from every point of the compass. And who and where are these invading foes? They are the demons of unemployment, who have robbed more than 8,000,000 American toilers of their jobs and caused the cry of distress to be heard in every city in the land. They are the marble-hearted monsters of poverty, hunger, and cold, which are making millions of helpless women beg for clothes; millions of starving children beg for bread. And where are these frightful foes? They are in every populous community and every industrial center in the United States.

Conclusive evidence of their brutal devastation can be seen on the streets of Washington every day and all day long. Overwhelming proof of the necessity for immediate Federal relief covers and crowds the pages of the voluminous printed hearings now on our desks. The evidence that admonishes us to action is so conspicuous that only the blind can not see it; it is so vociferous that only the deaf can not hear it; it is so pathetic that the human heart can not resist it.

The evidence of the dire necessity for immediate Federal relief for the destitute unemployed and their dependent ones increases with every swing of the pendulum. The demand for aid becomes more imperative with every tick of the clock.

All who have participated in the debate have either expressedly or impliedly admitted that millions of our people are, without any fault of their own, overwhelmed with poverty and distress, and that their suffering ought to be relieved. But as to the agencies and methods of relief, the opinions of the supporters of the bill irreconcilably conflict with the opinions of those who seek to defeat it.

Let us briefly consider the reasons which certain Senators have assigned for opposing direct Federal aid.

For example, the senior Senator from Ohio objects to the granting of Federal aid to the unemployed, the unclothed, and the unfed on the ground that the States and cities should exclusively relieve the distress of their own people, and because the Senator further believes that an unemployed, hungry citizen who accepts direct aid from the Federal Government thereby diminishes his patriotism and sacrifices his self-respect. In the most-labored and illogical argument that the distinguished Senator ever made—an argument in comparison with which Einstein's theory of relativity becomes personified, soul-satisfying simplicity—the Senate was informed that a faultless, jobless, hungry man may honorably and justifiably accept necessary relief from the government of his State or his city, but for the same man, in the same circumstances, to accept similar relief directly from the Government of his country would be demoralizing and deplorable in the highest degree. This extraordinary argument of differentiation between tweedledum and tweedledee the eminent Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] promptly, eloquently, and completely annihilated, to the unrestrained delight of the crowded galleries and the entire satisfaction of the senatorial friends of the Costigan-La Follette bill.

The able junior Senator from Ohio [Mr. BULKLEY] opposes the bill on the ground that if it should be passed by the Congress, it would be vetoed by the President. But the senior Senator from Ohio, the chairman of the Republican National Committee, and the principal, if not the only real, supporting pillar of the administration, has expressly declared that even he does not know the President's attitude toward the bill. Therefore we should not be restrained from voting our sentiments and discharging our duty by the fear of the distinguished Democratic Senator as to what the Republican President will do. But if it were certainly known instead of uncertainly believed that the President would veto the bill, that fact would not afford a Member of the Senate the slightest justification for voting against the measure. It is our plain duty to pass such bills as the country desires and deserves regardless of whether the President approves or disapproves our action.

The senior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. REED] has, with his characteristic earnestness, argued against the proposed direct Federal aid for the alleged reasons that no justifiable necessity for such aid has been shown to exist and because each State should solve its own unemployment problems. The Senator from Pennsylvania said, among other things—

> Pennsylvania * * * has a shocking number of unemployed this minute, * * * but Pennsylvania can fend for itself.

This argument was conclusively refuted long before it was made. Since this Congress convened on the 7th day of last December two vast armies of the unemployed have besieged this Capitol and petitioned for work and shelter and food.

The greater of these armies, which consisted of about 12,000 hungry soldiers, was recruited in Pittsburgh, the home of the senior Senator from Pennsylvania. Under the leadership of no anarchist, no bolshevist, no sensationalist, but under the command of a patriotic, humanitarian, devout Catholic priest—Father Cox—that army of 12,000 unemployed trudged 300 miles to this Capitol to tell the Congress and the President that multitudes of Pennsylvanians want Federal aid in their distress and that Pennsylvania can not adequately "fend for itself." How many of Father Cox's 12,000 jobless, hungry, footsore soldiers will be satisfied with the kind of "fending" the Senator considers sufficient? Will they not, with one accord, say to the "fender" and its defender, in the words of the afflicted Job, "Miserable comforters are ye all."

The brilliant senior Senator from Alabama, for whom I have the warmest friendship and the greatest respect, has most impressively expounded the political philosophy of the immortal Jefferson in opposition to the Costigan-La Follette bill. The Senator has ably argued that for the Federal Government directly to grant and indirectly administer relief to the starving, the destitute, and diseased will be to infringe upon the rights of the States. No one in this Chamber or elsewhere shall go before me in loyalty to the political principles of Thomas Jefferson, the greatest Democrat since the crucifixion, and one of the greatest humanitarians of all time. But after I had with bated breath and the deepest appreciation listened to the Senator's speech, I read it in the calm seclusion of my room, free from the hypnotic influence of the Senator's eloquence, and searched it in vain for anything that the able Senator had attributed to Mr. Jefferson which can logically be considered an obstacle to the passage of the bill.

The one thing upon which Mr. Jefferson was perhaps more insistent than upon any other was, that laws should be so formed and enforced as to be most beneficial to the masses of the people. Who that is familiar with Mr. Jefferson's devotion to the welfare of the common people and his unfailing sympathy for the distressed will doubt, if he were present to-day, that he would most zealously advocate the passage of the Costigan-La Follette bill? Since Mr. Jefferson can not come here from the silent land to speak for himself and the suffering humanity which he faithfully served and ardently loved, let us, in the matter of applying the political principles of the founder of the Democratic Party to the Costigan-La Follette bill, very respectfully appeal from the distinguished Senator from Alabama to Mr. Claude G. Bowers, the world's greatest authority on Mr. Jefferson and his political principles. On the 9th day of February the following article by Mr. Bowers appeared in Mr. Hearst's Washington Times:

ARE AMERICAN CHILDREN LESS DESERVING?

By Claude G. Bowers, author of the Party Battles of the Jackson Period, the Struggle for Democracy in America, Jefferson and Hamilton, the Tragic Era, and other important works

From the beginning it must have been clear that one of two things would have to be done about these 8,000,000 unemployed and their dependents; work would have to be furnished through a prosperity loan such as was urged a year ago by Mr. Hearst, Senator WAGNER, and Senator LA FOLLETTE, or money to prevent starvation would have to be appropriated from the Treasury.

The administration was against the prosperity loan—which, politically, would have been the best thing possible for the administration.

If it is now against direct relief, it goes on record as washing its hands entirely of the human problem of the unemployed; and that will not be good for the administration in any sense.

WE ARE AGAINST THE "DOLE"

We are in favor of the appropriation; and we are against the "dole." For the appropriation proposed by Senators WAGNER and LA FOLLETTE have nothing in common with the English "dole," where the term originated.

Senator LA FOLLETTE made this plain in his illuminating Senate speech:

"The bill does not contemplate definite and specific allowances to individuals and to their dependents. It is based entirely upon the traditional American method of relief, namely, relief on the basis of need. It does not propose to set up a separate agency whereby the Federal Government will, through a great bureaucracy in Washington, make direct payments in cash or in kind to individual citizens in the respective communities. The bill proposes to utilize the agencies of relief which are now in existence and which are now cracking and groaning under the load they are attempting to carry."

WE HAVE HELPED THE UNEMPLOYED IN EUROPE

The President's Unemployment Emergency Committee, under Mr. Gifford, has failed; and the testimony of Mr. Gifford before the Senate committee disclosed such a profound ignorance of conditions as to explain its failure even to comprehend the crisis.

Now men, women, and children are up against the guns. And, as Senator LA FOLLETTE said, "During the period since this depression began this is the first time that Congress has turned seriously to the consideration of the rank and file of the people of the United States."

Those eager to help the banks and railroads are seeking to impose the falsehood upon the people that the Government never has appropriated money for the relief of citizens suffering through no fault of their own. Millions time and time again have been appropriated for the purpose, as the record shows.

Not only have we appropriated millions for the relief of citizens here, but we have appropriated millions for the relief of men, women, and children in other lands. Thus money from the Treasury went to succor the destitute in Cuba, in the French West Indies, in Italy, in China.

Is the answer made that these were the victims of earthquakes? It was famine—such a famine as confronts millions of our own—in China.

But not only have we appropriated money to prevent the starvation and desolation of victims of earthquakes and famines, due to failures of crops, we have appropriated vast sums to feed the European victims of economic depression. We have appropriated money, if you please, to help the unemployed in Europe.

CHILDREN ARE DYING OF UNDERNOURISHMENT

There are millions of American children who are literally starving, dying of undernourishment because deprived of milk through the unemployment of their fathers, according to social-welfare agencies and charitable societies.

Eight years ago, when that was true of the children in a European country, a demand was made on Congress for money from the American Treasury to feed these children.

The demand was made by Herbert Hoover, a written demand served on a congressional committee.

In this demand he said:

"Our only hope is that the next generation will be better than this one, and there is no hope if they are to be stunted and degenerate from undernourishment. I recognize the arguments that may be brought against charitable actions, but I refuse to apply these arguments to children."

But it appears Mr. Hoover is applying these arguments to the children of the United States.

THE NATIONAL GOVERNMENT MUST DO ITS PART

Mr. Hoover had no objections to using the $20,000,000 appropriated from the Treasury to feed the undernourished children of Russia 11 years ago; nor did the American Red Cross. Just how does it become vicious to appropriate American money to furnish proper nourishment to American children?

And private charity is unable to furnish them with sufficient food.

And local governmental units, on which the President urges a "dole," have reached, or are reaching, the end of their resources.

And the plain, brutal truth is that if American children are not "to be stunted and degenerate from undernourishment" the National Government must do its part.

If Republican Senators have decided, as a party, to oppose the feeding of these children and their mothers, that is their privilege; they have the right to proclaim the party policy and attitude; but the humane people of America who heard no protest against the governmental feeding by us of the children of China, Cuba, Germany, and Russia still have their right to pass upon that party policy and attitude in November.

The administration can not talk "humanity" about the children of Europe and talk "dole" when it comes to the prevention of the starvation of the women and children of America.

It can not say that we can not afford as a Nation to meet the Nation's responsibility to the millions of undernourished and slowly starving children of America but can afford to take over the billions of the debts of other nations and pay them out of the American Treasury.

More and more we are convinced that what we need is an administration that thinks of America first, and of all America, and not merely a small and powerful segment of America.

My unqualified approval of all that Mr. Bowers has thus said will be indicated by my vote in favor of the bill.

The Congress regularly appropriates millions of dollars to exterminate the boll weevil and the corn borer and the numerous other pests that prey upon the plant life of the Nation. The Congress regularly appropriates money to eradicate the contagious diseases of horses and cattle and hogs. Let us not, in this crisis, forever disgrace ourselves by doing less for American women and children than we have habitually done for American cattle and hogs.

The Congress has recently appropriated hundreds of millions of dollars for the relief of the railroads and the financial institutions of the country. Few, if any, doubt that these appropriations were highly necessary and proper. No one believes that they have interfered with the rights of the States. No one believes that the cotton growers of Alabama or the stock raisers of Iowa or the owners of banks and railroads in Pennsylvania and Ohio have sacrificed any of their integrity, their self-respect, or their Americanism by accepting the aid that the Congress has extended them from the Federal Treasury.

In view of all which we should not permit any amount of fallacious reasoning or illogical argumentation to convince us that it is un-American for the Congress to grant relief to millions of destitute Americans or that it will be unpatriotic or unbecoming for the blameless, jobless, hungry American people to save their lives by accepting the relief.

As the Federal Government has in recent years directly provided shelter and clothing and food for calamity-stricken people around the world, so in this time of nation-wide suffering that beggars description and defies comprehension let us, as truly American Senators, with American money, relieve American distress. As we have fed the famished children of Europe and Asia and the islands of the sea, so let us feed the millions of American children who are starving to death.

In the same spirit of humanity and mercy in which we have relieved suffering in other lands, let us now relieve it in our native land. Let us, with American courage, American generosity, and American promptitude, extend adequate relief to every deserving, jobless, hungry American toiler and those dependent upon him, to the end that the perishing may be rescued, nation-wide suffering alleviated, and the standard of American living preserved; to the end that we may receive the blessing of the words of the Master, "Inasmuch as ye have done it unto one of the least of these my brethren, ye have done it unto me"; to the end that future generations of American women and children may sing with increased energy and intensified zeal:

My country, 'tis of thee,
Sweet land of liberty,
Of thee I sing.
Long may our land be bright
With freedom's holy light,
Protect us by Thy might,
Great God our King.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. THOMAS].

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the amendment may be considered as pending to be called up later. I realize that if the Black-Walsh-Bulkley substitute should prevail, I should not have that opportunity. I submit the unanimous-consent request.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I did not understand the nature of the request of the Senator from Oklahoma.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. I have asked unanimous consent that the amendment proposed by myself be considered as pending to be called up later, realizing that in the event another of the substitutes should carry I shall not have the opportunity to present it.

Mr. McNARY. Is this offered to the text of the original proposal or to the so-called Black amendment?

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. To the text of the original Costigan-La Follette bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered. The original text of the bill is open to amendment. If there be no further amendment to the original text, the substitute is open to amendment.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator will state it.

Mr. McNARY. Has the time passed for the proposing of amendments to the original text?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Such an amendment can be offered at any time before a vote is had upon the substitute, but it is customary to call for all amendments to the original text before any amendments are offered to the substitute.

Mr. McNARY. Then there will not be a complete foreclosure of those who subsequently may want to offer an amendment to the original text?

The VICE PRESIDENT. There would be if any of the substitutes shall have been adopted.

Mr. McNARY. I am calling the attention of those who are in the Chamber to that situation.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill is open to amendment. Two Senators gave notice that they have amendments to offer.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Costigan	Johnson	Robinson, Ind.
Austin	Couzens	Jones	Schall
Bailey	Cutting	Kean	Sheppard
Bankhead	Dale	Kendrick	Shipstead

The VICE PRESIDENT. Eighty-four Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present.

Mr. DILL. Mr. President, I have an amendment to the substitute, which I offered earlier in the afternoon and which is upon the desk of the Presiding Officer.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Let it be reported.

The CHIEF CLERK. The Senator from Washington proposes, in the substitute, on page 4, lines 16 to 20, to strike out the following words:

And shall also state that he will recommend to the legislature of his State and also to the people thereof such action as may be necessary and appropriate to insure the repayment to the United States of all amounts received by the State pursuant to such request.

Mr. DILL. Mr. President, my purpose in offering the amendment is to take out of the bill a requirement which it seems to me makes it necessary in some instances for the governor of a State to recommend to his legislature something that is forbidden by the constitution of the State. In some of the States the constitution forbids the creation of debt, and yet in order to obtain this relief a governor would be required to agree to ask his legislature to do a thing which under his oath of office and under the constitution of the State he is forbidden to do.

The purpose of the substitute clearly is to provide that the money is to be charged against the State. In the latter part of page 5 of the printed substitute there is a proviso reading as follows:

Provided further, That if within three years after the approval of this act any State to which advances have been made under sections 3, 4, and 5 of this act has not made provision for the repayment of the same there shall be deducted thereafter for each of the following years an amount equal to one-fifth part of the sums so advanced from any sums that would be paid to any such State by virtue of allocations from any appropriation or appropriations that may be made pursuant to and to carry out the purposes of the Federal highway act.

So that the purpose of the sponsors of the substitute is entirely protected without the requirement upon the governor to do a thing which the constitution of his State might forbid.

Mr. KING. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. DILL. I yield.

Mr. KING. Does the Senator think anything in a State constitution would prohibit the governor from making a recommendation to the people and to the legislature for an amendment to the constitution?

Mr. DILL. No; but while that recommendation was being made and that amendment being adopted I should hope that the hard times would be over. The Senator knows we can not amend the constitution of any State without going to the people of the State. This need, if it is a need at all, is immediate, it is pressing, it is now. I see no reason for embarrassing any State, for embarrassing the governor of any State, for putting any State on a different basis from other States. In the light of the fact that the bill contains in itself language which protects the Federal Government in the future to the extent of having the money withheld by the Federal Government from later appropriations, I see no necessity for it.

I may say that the Senator from Ohio [Mr. BULKLEY] has been most interested in this language, and I have discussed it with him. He has informed me that if I will insert in section 3, in line 3, after the word "allocation"——

Mr. BULKLEY. No, Mr. President; I suggest that the insertion be made in line 11, at the end of the line.

Mr. DILL. After the word "States"?

Mr. BULKLEY. Yes; in line 12, after the word "States."

Mr. DILL. Insert the words "as advancements," so that it would read:

SEC. 3. There is also hereby authorized to be appropriated the sum of $375,000,000, one-third of which shall be immediately available, for allocation to the several States as advancements in the manner hereinafter provided. Not more than $125,000,000 of this amount shall be expended in the fiscal year ending June 30, 1932.

If I will include those words, the Senator has no objection to striking out the language I have indicated. Therefore I shall move as a part of this amendment, in section 3, line 20, after the word "States," to insert the words "as advancements"; and I ask that the two amendments may be considered together.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to considering the amendments together? The Chair hears none, and the question is on agreeing to the amendments.

The amendments were agreed to.

Mr. HAYDEN. I offer an amendment to the substitute.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Arizona to the amendment in the nature of a substitute will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 2 of the amendment in the nature of a substitute, line 15 to line 19, it is proposed to strike out the words "and except that such amounts may be expended upon highways, streets, or bridges within the limits of municipalities without regard to the limitations contained in the Federal highway act, as amended, upon construction within municipalities" and insert in lieu thereof the following: "but the same may be used to meet the provisions of such act as to State funds required on Federal-aid projects, and except that in the expenditure of such sum the limitations contained in the Federal highway act, as amended, upon construction within municipalities of 2,500 or more population and upon the payments per mile which may be made from Federal funds shall not apply."

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. President, the amendment has a two-fold purpose. One part of it is to change the language of the proposed substitute so that the expenditure when made may not only be used as 100 per cent Federal aid but may also be used in lieu of State funds to match Federal aid. I will discuss that phase a little later.

The other part of the amendment is a mere perfection of the text, to which I think everyone will agree. The proposed substitute as it now stands seeks, in a general way, to lift the limitations with respect to the use of Federal-aid funds within municipalities; and I thought it better to refer directly to the Federal highway act, which, so far as the population of towns is concerned, reads as follows:

SEC. 2. That for the purpose of this act the term "rural post road" shall be construed to mean any public road over which the United States mails now are or may hereafter be transported, excluding every street and road in a place having a population, as shown by the latest available Federal census, of 2,500 or more, except that portion of any such street or road along which the houses average more than 200 feet apart.

My amendment refers specifically to the Federal-aid highway act so far as cities and towns of 2,500 or more population are concerned.

The other provision with respect to the limitation of cost per mile refers to the act of April 4, 1930, which reads as follows:

SEC. 3. Section 6 of such act of July 11, 1916, as amended and supplemented, is further amended so that the limitation of payments which the Secretary of Agriculture may make is increased to $25,000 per mile, exclusive of the cost of bridges of more than 20 feet clear span: Provided, That the Federal participation shall be limited to $15,000 per mile until the original certified 7 per cent system of such State shall have been surfaced: Provided further, That any such increase above $15,000 per mile shall be certified by the Director of the Bureau of Public Roads and the Secretary of Agriculture as securing actual extension of the highway system or economy in its construction.

If the bill should be passed as now written, while it would be possible to do construction work within municipalities, there could only be expended $15,000 a mile, and I am sure nobody wants that limitation left in the law. If Federal aid is to be extended to cities, the work will be in connection with overpasses or other heavy structures of one kind or another, the cost of which would amount to more than $15,000 a mile.

Now, as to the other phase of the matter—that is, the right of the States to use money appropriated under this authorization either as 100 per cent Federal aid or in lieu of State funds to match Federal funds—I beg to invite the attention of the Senate to the fact that in the last session of Congress $80,000,000 was appropriated to be used in lieu of State funds to match Federal aid. There is now good evidence that there are many States in the Union which are having great difficulty in matching their Federal aid. Therefore the States should have a 2-way advantage: First, of applying for road construction under the 100 per cent plan as is now in the bill, which is, that contracts may be let, and when it is completed the United States will pay for the entire cost of such work. That is what the Black amendment now provides. Second, where any State is unable to match its Federal aid, Congress should permit the State to do what we did in the case of the $80,000,000 appropriation last year, namely, use the money in lieu of State funds to match Federal aid. The States should have both privileges in this bill; and, if adopted, that is what the amendment will accomplish.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Arizona to the amendment in the nature of a substitute.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, I should like the attention of the authors of the proposed substitute as to the language on page 2, line 1, up to the provision which contains the ambiguity to which I desire to refer.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. SMITH. I yield.

Mr. BLACK. I wonder if the Senator would object to disposing of the pending amendment before he takes up the question which he has in mind.

Mr. SMITH. Certainly.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Arizona to the amendment in the nature of a substitute.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President, so far as I am individually concerned, I favor the amendment offered by the Senator from Arizona and trust it may be adopted.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Arizona to the amendment in the nature of a substitute.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, in line 2, page 2, the proposed substitute reads:

Such amount—

That is the amount under this bill that will be available for the purposes indicated—shall be in addition to any amounts heretofore authorized to be appropriated for such purposes, but not more than $125,000,000 thereof shall be expended in the fiscal year ending June 30, 1932.

Does that mean that of the sum provided in this bill, together with other amounts when added together, only $125,000,000 may be used?

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from South Carolina yield to the Senator from Alabama?

Mr. SMITH. I yield.

Mr. BLACK. I do not so understand. I may say that it was my intention and the intention of those who drew this amendment with reference to this particular fund to state that not more than $125,000,000 of the $375,000,000 should be used during the fiscal year.

Mr. SMITH. Exactly, but from reading this language it seems as if the two would have to be added together and that only $125,000,000 of the aggregate could be used; that is, of the amounts heretofore appropriated plus the amount authorized by the bill when added together only $125,000,000 shall be available.

Mr. BLACK. I may say to the Senator that if there is any question of ambiguity about that expression, I would invite the attention of the Senator from Montana and the junior Senator from Ohio to the suggestion that it might be made to read as follows:

Such amount shall be in addition to any amounts heretofore authorized to be appropriated for such purposes, but not more than $125,000,000 of such $375,000,000 shall be expended in the fiscal year ending June 30, 1932.

Mr. SMITH. That, I think, would make it clear.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, I can not conceive that the construction which the Senator from South Carolina fears might be given to this provision could possibly be given to it. I think it would be covered if after the figure "$125,000,000" there were inserted simply the words "hereby authorized" or "authorized by this act," so as to read "not more than $125,000,000 of the amount authorized by this act."

Mr. SMITH. The Senator sees where the ambiguity might arise. The provision reads:

Such amounts shall be in addition to any amounts heretofore authorized to be appropriated for such purposes, but not more than $125,000,000 thereof.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. That refers to the amount.

Mr. SMITH. Yes; but the two have been added together. It reads "not more than $125,000,000 thereof shall be expended," and so forth. It looks as though after the two shall have been added together the expenditure shall then be limited so that only $125,000,000 of the amounts heretofore appropriated and the amount authorized by this bill may be expended in the fiscal year ending June 30, 1932.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I suggest to the Senator, then, that he move to strike out the word "thereof" and insert "authorized by this act."

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, in accordance with the suggestion made, I think it would clarify the text if it were amended so as to read that "not more than $125,000,000 of the amount authorized by this act shall be expended," and so forth.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator offer that amendment?

Mr. SMITH. I offer that amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Let the amendment to the amendment be reported.

Mr. GEORGE. May I invite the Senator's attention to the fact that it would be more advisable to use the words "authorized in this section," because there is another appropriation of $375,000,000?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. The Senator from Georgia is quite right about that.

Mr. GEORGE. It should be limited either to the title or to the section.

Mr. SMITH. I suggest, then, that it be amended so as to read that "not more than $125,000,000 authorized in this section shall be expended," and so forth.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Let the amendment to the amendment be reported.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 2, line 3, after the numerals "$125,000,000," it is proposed to insert "authorized in this section."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from South Carolina to the amendment in the nature of a substitute.

Mr. BULKLEY. The word "thereof" should be stricken out.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from South Carolina modify his amendment accordingly?

Mr. SMITH. I do.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment offered by the Senator from South Carolina to the amendment in the nature of a substitute, as modified, will be reported.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to strike out the word "thereof" and insert the words "authorized in this section."

Mr. SMITH. That is right.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment as modified to the amendment in the nature of a substitute.

The amendment, as modified, to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GEORGE. In line 21, page 4, I move to strike out the words "and can not be obtained either from public or private sources"; in other words, in line 21, after the word "State," to strike out the remainder of the sentence.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator is using the reprint. Will he give the place in the original print.

Mr. GEORGE. After the word "State," in line 21, strike out the words "and can not be obtained either from public or private sources."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment offered by the Senator from Georgia to the amendment in the nature of a substitute will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 4, line 13, after the word "State," it is proposed to strike out the words "and can not be obtained either from public or private sources."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Georgia to the amendment in the nature of a substitute.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, I wish to explain why I offer this amendment.

The amendment offered by the Senator from Washington [Mr. DILL] has been adopted, and that amendment removes the original provision that the governor of the State, in making application for any part of this fund, shall agree to recommend to the legislature of his State or to the people of the State the repayment of the amount obtained by the State. Not only did the amendment offered by the Senator from Washington, striking out that language, prevail, but, as a part of it, it contained an affirmative provision that the moneys allocated to the States under the $375,000,000 appropriated by the third section of the substitute measure should be considered as advancements by the Federal Government to the several States.

That being true, it seems to me that there can be no possible reason for requiring the governor of the State, in making his application to share in the $375,000,000 provided in the second part of this substitute, to certify that that fund can not be obtained either from private or from public sources. Obviously, many governors would not be able to do that. Obviously, if the $375,000,000 should remain as a pure gift to the States, to be used by the States as a gratuity from the Federal Government, the language would have some appropriate place; but if this $375,000,000 is to be an advance to the State against future Federal appropriations to the State, then there is no reason why any State should be denied its part of this advance because the governor, forsooth, found himself unable to make the definite statement that the funds which he wished to administer for relief purposes in the State can not be obtained either from private or from public sources.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. GEORGE. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. LEWIS. I beg to interrogate the eminent Senator from Georgia on a point that arises at once in view of his last statement.

The State of Illinois appears in the public reports to have passed an act granting $20,000,000 for relief to the people of the State of Illinois. Would these amendments or these constructions, to which the Senator has alluded, prevent the Governor of Illinois from returning to the State, out of the fund received from the Federal Government, $20,000,000 to offset the $20,000,000 that has been paid by the State for the relief of its poor or its needy?

Mr. GEORGE. Does the Senator mean the presence of the language in the bill as it now stands?

Mr. LEWIS. Yes, sir. Would the suggestion made by the Senator from Georgia prevent the Governor of the State of Illinois, if he should make a succcessful request for funds from the Federal appropriation, from applying those funds to offset the $20,000,000 paid by the State to the needy of the State?

Mr. GEORGE. If I understand the Senator, I do not think any State could apply any part of the $375,000,000 to the repayment to itself of any sum of money already used or already made available for that purpose by State action; but I do not know that I understand the Senator's question.

Mr. LEWIS. Where that sum has been expended by the State for its own needy within the purposes of the bill, under the amendment suggested by the Senator from Georgia would the governor be prohibited from applying the sum obtained under the Federal measure to offset the amount that the State had paid to the needy of the State?

Mr. GEORGE. I think he would under the bill, but I do not know that my amendment would change my answer to the Senator's question.

Mr. LEWIS. I must have misunderstood the Senator's observation a moment past, then.

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Kentucky?

Mr. GEORGE. I yield to the Senator from Kentucky.

Mr. LOGAN. I will ask the Senator from Georgia to explain to me how the governor of any State could comply with the certification required in the substitute unless the amendment suggested by the Senator is adopted?

The governor must certify that the funds can not be raised from public or private sources. It is true, I believe, that there is no limit in the constitution of any State on the tax rate that may be imposed for State purposes. In my State, for instance, it would be utterly impossible for the governor to certify that the money could not be raised from public funds, because there is nothing to prevent the legislature imposing such a tax rate as will raise the funds. So, unless the amendment of the Senator from Georgia is adopted, I do not see how any governor, unless he stultified himself, could make a certification that the funds could not be raised from public sources.

Mr. GEORGE. I think the Senator from Kentucky is entirely right. May I say—and this is in part answer to the Senator from Illinois—that the $375,000,000 provided for in section 3 of the substitute is now designated as an advance to the State; but while it is an advance to the State, and to be repaid by the State out of future appropriations by the Federal Government for road purposes, nevertheless the State is not entitled to share in that fund or have any part of it allocated to the State unless the governor of the State shall certify that it is necessary for emergency relief in the State. He must also certify, under the bill as it now stands, to the further fact that he can not obtain the sum either from public or from private sources.

In other words, the governor of the State must be able to certify, before his State can share in the distribution of the $375,000,000 provided in the third section of this substitute measure, that an emergency relief fund is needed in his State, that the need actually exists, and in addition that he can not obtain such fund either from private or from public sources. I think it is obvious that if the governor is required to make that certificate, few governors or few States could make the certificate.

It may be said that that is precisely the reason why the language is inserted. If so, then there is not the slightest justification for this legislation, because the Senate and not the governor of any State is called upon to adjudge whether an emergency exists in the United States that justifies the expenditure of $375,000,000 out of the Public Treasury. If the Senate adjudges that such emergency does exist, and the fund is set apart to the States as an advancement against future appropriations to the States, then there can be no justification for the requirement which is imposed in this very drastic language, to wit, that the governor must not only certify that the sum is absolutely needed for an emergency relief fund in his State but that it is impossible for him to obtain the fund from private or from public sources.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. GEORGE. I yield to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. KING. I desire to ask a question for information. Does the Senator think that the Federal Government should make this emergency appropriation if any State is able to care for the situation?

Mr. GEORGE. No; I do not.

Mr. KING. I have understood—the Senator will pardon me—that this legislation was justified upon the ground that many of the States, or the people within the States, were not able to care for those who were out of employment, and, therefore, that the Federal Government as an emergency proposition was making an advance to the States; but it seems to me—and the Senator will pardon me; I think he has answered my question—that if States are able to deal with the question themselves the Federal Government has no business to interfere in their affairs or to assume this responsibility.

Mr. GEORGE. I am disposed to agree with the Senator from Utah; but he is discussing the merits of the measure now. I am not discussing the merits at all. I am saying, however, that it is for the Senate of the United States to adjudge of the necessity for this relief. It is not for the governor of any State to adjudge for the Senate that a relief fund is necessary to feed the hungry and to clothe the naked within his State. He should be required, of course, to meet certain reasonable conditions; and, of course, he would not be compelled to accept any of the fund unless he found that a need did exist in his State, nor would he be entitled to accept any of the fund unless he certified that there did exist a need. But if he certified that there did exist a need in his State for part of this fund, when it is recalled that it is now an advancement to the State, that ought to be sufficient, if he is otherwise willing to comply with such other reasonable requirements as may have been imposed by this legislation.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Florida?

Mr. GEORGE. I do.

Mr. FLETCHER. I was called out of the Chamber, and I wish the Senator would explain precisely what his amendment proposes. I do not quite understand it. Does the Senator propose to strike out everything after the word "Treasury," in line 19?

Mr. GEORGE. I propose to strike out, after the word "State," in line 21, on page 4, the words "and can not be obtained either from public or private sources."

Mr. FLETCHER. I see. I did not know but that it was proposed to strike out everything after the word "Treasury," in line 11; but that amendment, I think, is sufficient.

Mr. GEORGE. No; I do not offer to strike out more than I have stated.

Mr. FLETCHER. At any rate, the Senator leaves in the bill the requirement that the governor shall make the request, and state that the request is based on an emergency in his State?

Mr. GEORGE. Not only that the governor shall make the request—thereby, of course, giving his consent to the appropriation to his State—but it is based upon the statement that it is necessary for emergency relief in the State; and I think that is quite sufficient.

Mr. FLETCHER. I think so, too.

Mr. GEORGE. Particularly when we have converted this appropriation into the form of an advance to the State against future appropriations to be made to it.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, I wonder if the Senator from Georgia will point out where there is any particular mandate upon the governor, once he gets this money, to use it for relief purposes. Why could he not pay off the $20,000,000 in the State of Illinois, or as much of it as he could, with the money he received from the Federal Government?

Mr. GEORGE. I do not think that is the purpose of the bill, nor do I think that is authorized by any language in the bill, because the governor must certify that it is necessary for relief purposes and he must also estimate the amount required, item by item. The Senator will see that in line 21, on page 4, the governor is required to include in his statement an estimate of the amount required for such relief and a list of the agencies within the State by which the amount requested will be administered. He is also, of course, required to report to the President and to the Senate and to the House of Representatives; and then "emergency relief" is defined in section 8 of the substitute, as I understand:

> As used in this act, the term "emergency relief" means relief in the form of money or commodities furnished to persons in their abode or habitation, or in shelters for the transient and homeless, or in the form of wages or other compensation for work furnished on the basis of need, and made necessary by reason of the emergency growing out of unemployment or other adverse economic conditions over and above the usual and ordinary expenditures for such relief, but not including old-age pensions under special acts, or public aid under special acts to mothers for the care of dependent children, or relief to veterans under special acts.

Mr. TYDINGS. I think the Senator misunderstood my question. I was assuming that a State had already appropriated money for emergency relief. Would the governor then be permitted to take his State's share out of the Federal fund to liquidate an obligation of the State to take care of emergency relief formerly made?

Mr. GEORGE. I do not think so. I would not be able to construe the substitute in any such manner as to authorize that course of procedure.

Mr. TYDINGS. I thought there ought to be some provision in the bill to the effect that "no money herein authorized to be advanced to the respective States shall take the place of or be a substitute for money already advanced by the States for the purposes of this act."

Mr. GEORGE. As a safeguarding amendment, that might well be; or it could be provided that no part of the $375,000,000 should be used for other than emergency relief as defined in section 8 of the bill. That, as I understand it, is the meaning of the substitute, either with or without the amendment which I have suggested.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President, will the Senator from Georgia yield to me?

Mr. GEORGE. I yield.

Mr. TRAMMELL. I heartily agree with the purpose of the Senator from Georgia in striking out the language to which he has made reference, but if we are to strike that language, should we not probably also include language to carry the idea of Congress that this is a fund to supplement any fund which might be raised through State agencies or through private sources? It has just occurred to me that we should strike the language after the word "and" in line 21, page 4, and substitute the words "that such fund is urgently needed, in addition to funds at the time available from public or private sources." That still retains the idea that the local authorities, the States, the counties, the municipalities, and also private citizens, shall render all assistance possible in providing funds, that this policy within the State is regarded as essential, and that the governor should so certify. I make that suggestion.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, I will say to the Senator from Florida that I have no objection to that, but what I have objected to and what I have moved to strike out, is the provision for the absolute statement of the governor that he could not obtain necessary relief funds from either private or public sources.

Mr. TRAMMELL. I thoroughly agree with the Senator from Georgia in his position with regard to that.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, the Senator from Georgia and the Senator from Florida are quite in accord, but it is a question as to how the amendment of the Senator from Georgia should be worded. I have no doubt that he would be willing to adopt the suggestion of the Senator from Florida as to the wording of the amendment.

Mr. GEORGE. I would, because it carries out the idea I had in mind. I do not want to take away from the State any obligation it may have to care for its needy.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President, I merely suggest a modification of the amendment proposed by the Senator from Georgia; that is, that on page 4, line 21, after the word "and," we strike out all down to and including the word "sources" on line 22 and insert the words "that such fund is urgently needed, in addition to funds at the time available from public or private sources."

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, instead of moving to strike out the language suggested by the Senator from Georgia, why not strike out the language in line 13, as follows, "Such State and can not be," and insert in lieu thereof the words "addition to such funds as can be," so that it will read, "accompanied by a statement that the amount so requested is necessary for emergency relief in addition to such funds as can be obtained from either public or private sources."

Mr. TRAMMELL. That would be agreeable to me.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, I do not know whether that will mean exactly what I have in mind or not. I doubt whether the language suggested would not have the same effect the present phrase would have. I would have no objection to the suggestion made by the Senator from Florida; indeed, I would be willing to accept his amendment; but if I understood the Senator from Montana, his language would perhaps be subject to the same construction as the language now in the bill.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I would scarcely think so. It would then read:

Accompanied by a statement that the amount so requested is necessary for emergency relief in addition to such funds as can be obtained from either public or private sources.

That would mean that they would get everything they could from public and private sources, but if that were not enough, they could get money from the Federal fund also.

Mr. GEORGE. I am in perfect agreement with that idea, but I did not want to make it obligatory upon the governor simply to issue a blanket statement that he could not by any possibility obtain the money from private or public sources.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President, I rather think the suggestion of the Senator from Montana is subject to the same criticism that was directed to the original language, which the Senator from Georgia [Mr. GEORGE] seeks to strike. That is merely a little milder, and is modified a little, but the governor would still have to certify that they could not raise the funds from public or private sources within the State, under the suggestion just made by the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH].

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. FESS in the chair). Will not the Senator from Georgia repeat his amendment, and does the Senator from Georgia accept the modification proposed by the Senator from Florida?

Mr. GEORGE. I have accepted the modification suggested by the Senator from Florida, but I am not able to repeat exactly the language he used.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Has the clerk at the desk the amendment proposed and the modification suggested?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk is having difficulty in finding where the Senator proposes to amend.

Mr. TRAMMELL. There seems to be a number of different prints of the bill, and frequently when an amendment is stated there is confusion on account of that fact. In the print of the bill I have before me the amendment will be, on page 4, line 21, after the word "and," to strike out all down to and including the word "sources," in line 22, and to insert in lieu thereof the words "that such fund is urgently needed, in addition to funds at the time available from public or private sources."

I would be glad to have the Senator from Georgia accept this modification of his amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Georgia accept the suggestion of the Senator from Florida?

Mr. GEORGE. I do.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment as modified.

Mr. BULKLEY. Mr. President, I dislike very much to be at variance with the distinguished Senator from Georgia [Mr. GEORGE], but I do not know whether the variance between us now is such that it can be reconciled. It seems to me that perhaps if in the modification suggested by the Senator from Florida, the words "urgently needed" might be left out and the word "necessary" substituted, perhaps we would all be on common ground. I ask the Senator from Georgia and the Senator from Florida whether that would meet the views they entertain?

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President, I will not object to that. I think it is a very good idea to get as strong a certificate as possible from the governor of the State. I feel that the governor ought to realize, when he is making the certificate to obtain these funds, that he is representing to the Federal Government a case of urgency and necessity, but I do not object to any change in the language to meet the views of the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, I think one of the purposes sought to be obtained by the Senator from Florida was to make it clear also that the money coming from the Federal Government was in addition to State and local funds, so that the governor could not take the money and apply it to some debt he had made in the name of emergency relief.

Mr. BULKLEY. Exactly so; and I think that is a laudable purpose.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Will the Senator from Ohio suggest what the modification is?

Mr. BULKLEY. I suggest that in the modification suggested by the Senator from Florida the words "urgently needed" be stricken out and the word "necessary" be substituted therefor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Georgia accept that modification?

Mr. GEORGE. I do. That would meet the objection I had in mind. I think it would harmonize our positions somewhat.

Mr. BULKLEY. I think that is the nearest we can get together.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment as modified.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, what is the amendment as modified?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will state the amendment as modified.

The CHIEF CLERK. The Senator from Georgia propposes, on page 4 of the original print, line 13, to strike out the words "can not be obtained either from public or private sources," and to insert the words "that such fund is necessary in addition to funds at the time available from public and private sources."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, in connection with the debate on the pending bill I ask that a press statement recently issued by me and an article published in a monthly known as State Government and entitled "The Story of What Several Legislatures Have Done Toward the Relief of Jobless Citizens," be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the matter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATEMENT BY SENATOR WALSH OF MASSACHUSETTS

OBJECTIONS TO S. 3045

This bill takes from the States and municipalities the control of relief activities. A Federal board is set up, to be directed by the Chief of the Children's Bureau. This Federal board is "to be charged with the administration of the act," is "to make studies and investigations and reports," is "to supply information for the guidance of the States," and "shall insure that the conditions under which funds are allocated to the States are complied with.

The amount the largest States, where relief demands are greatest, would receive is a mere pittance compared with the cost of relief. Massachusetts would be allocated the first year ending July 1 next about $1,500,000. For every dollar of income tax collected for the country as a whole during the calendar year 1931 about 5 per cent, or one-twentieth of the whole, was collected from citizens and corporations in Massachusetts. In the light of these figures indicating Massachusetts' share of the Federal taxes for the $375,000,000 proposed to be appropriated, Massachusetts would contribute $3 to the Federal Treasury to get back $1 for relief in its own State.

None of the State governments have petitioned for Federal relief, nor have they indicated that they were not able to take care of the relief problem, though burdensome. Most States have appropriated nothing from State funds for relief. If there are States that are financially unable to meet the relief necessitated by the present depression, then it may be necessary to obtain Federal aid. In such cases I favor the making of loans by the Federal Government to such States, but the States should first seek to relieve the relief burdens of their local communities.

If Federal relief funds are to be appropriated, they should be distributed not on a basis of population but on a basis of reimbursement or contribution in aid, dependent upon the increased expenditures made by municipal, State, and private agencies in the present emergency. The sole justification for Federal aid is to relieve the burdens of the States and subdivisions because of extraordinary relief demands that are beyond their capacity to meet, and therefore those States and communities that are carrying the largest burden should receive the larger share of Federal aid.

The relief this bill contemplates, once inaugurated, is certain to increase rapidly and become a fixed principle.

OBJECTIONS TO THE SUBSTITUTE FOR S. 3045

It provides three hundred and seventy-five million for Federal aid to States for road building. (At present one hundred and twenty-five million annually is being given to States for road building on a 50-50 basis, every Federal dollar to be matched by a State dollar.) This additional road money, however, though it is to be apportioned to the States in the same way now provided for in existing law, and which I have always opposed, is to be spent differently. First, it does not have to be matched by the States with any money of their own; second, the States may expend the money to defray the cost of "highways, streets, and bridges within the limits of the municipalities without the limitations imposed in the present highway act, etc."

This road money is not a loan to the States. It is an outright gift. Not more than one hundred and twenty-five millions "shall be expended between now and June 30." Presumably the entire balance may be spent in the following fiscal year. Of this appropriation Massachusetts would pay in Federal taxes approximately $13,000,000 and receive approximately $5,500,000.

A second three hundred and seventy-five million is provided for in the bill (of which one hundred and twenty-five million is to go out between now and June 30 and the balance in the following year). This amount is to be apportioned to the States on the basis of population (same as in the Costigan-La Follette bill). But whereas S. 3045 only allocates 40 per cent of the total according to population, the substitute allocates the entire fund on that basis.

The money is to be turned over to the States on the requests of the governors "accompanied by a statement that the money so requested is necessary for emergency relief and can not be obtained either from public or private sources." The governor "shall agree that he will recommend to the legislature of his State and also to the people thereof such action as may be necessary and appropriate to insure repayment to the Federal Government of all amounts received from the United States." This puts the funds on the basis of a loan, but is indefinite as to the terms of payment.

FEDERAL AID TO STATE ROAD BUILDING

The unemployment problem and the welfare needs are exceedingly more acute in the industrial centers and populous States, yet in the distribution of Federal road building funds Massachusetts, in common with other populous States of limited areas, is in the rôle of a contributor rather than a beneficiary. No matter from what angle the figures are studied, the conclusion is inescapable that the States of the North and East bear not only the lion's share of their own road-building programs, but contribute the major share to the road-building programs of less populous States of large areas in the South and West.

So long as Federal road money was merely a drop in the bucket of the National Budget, its distribution was of minor consequence. It is no longer that. It was close to a quarter of a billion dollars this year—a vast sum of money under any circumstances and a serious matter indeed in the present circumstances of the Treasury.

In round figures, for every dollar the National Government collects in Massachusetts in Federal taxes, it gives back one cent as its contribution toward the cost of building highways in Massachusetts. For every dollar the Government collects in some of the States, in Federal taxes, it gives back $1 and even more for road building.

These are not isolated or extreme examples. Alabama, at the top of the alphabetical list of the States, contributed $4,500,000 in Federal taxes this year and was allotted $2,500,000 of Federal road aid money. That meant that Alabama got back for its roads nearly 65 cents of every dollar its citizens paid into the Federal Treasury. Arizona's Federal tax bill this year was $2,250,000, her Federal road-aid allotment $1,750,000; Arkansas' Federal tax collections totaled $1,913,706 and her Federal road money $2,174,786. Arkansas got back for her roads $1.10 for every $1 of Federal taxes paid. If Massachusetts received for her roads $1.10 of every $1 of Federal taxes paid, Massachusetts would have received in 1930, $125,000,000, instead of approximately $1,000,000.

Massachusetts, on the other hand, was credited with a total of $115,000,000 Federal tax collections in 1930 and was allotted $1,090,022 in Federal road money. In the 1931 fiscal year, ending last June, tax collections were less and the Bay State total was a little under $90,000,000. As Congress in the meantime had increased the total of Federal road money from seventy-five million to one hundred and twenty-five million, the amount allotted to Massachusetts was increased pro rata and her total was $1,813,916. That makes the State of Massachusetts' share this year two cents out of every dollar of taxes paid.

There is another angle to the Federal aid in the State road-building programs. Roughly, 5 cents out of every dollar spent by Massachusetts on her State roads is contributed by the Federal Treasury. The other 95 cents comes from the citizens of the State in State taxation. In Nevada, on the other hand, the proportions are 35 cents by the Federal Government and 65 cents by the State.

The history of the expansion of the Federal aid for State road building from modest beginnings to its present gigantic proportions furnishes an instructive example of the ways and workings of Government bureaus and of Congress and the present-day tendency to "raid the Federal Treasury" for the carrying on of the activities that belong to the State governments.

The United States Bureau of Public Roads is an adjunct of the Department of the Interior. It was created in 1833 with an appropriation of $10,000 to "enable the Secretary of Agriculture to make inquiries into systems of road management and road building." This bureau had a quiet and inexpensive existence until 1912.

It may be noted in passing that at the time of its creation Massachusetts and New Jersey were the only States in the Union that had State highway departments.

It was the Post Office appropriation act for the fiscal year of 1913 that launched the United States bureau on its career of road building. Congress appropriated $500,000 to be expended by the bureau in cooperation with the Postmaster General "for the improvement of post roads."

In 1916 Congress was persuaded that rural free delivery required the Federal Government to take an active hand in State road building. It was proposed that in the building of "post roads," the Federal Government should assist the States on a "50–50 basis," matching every State dollar expended on such roads with a Federal dollar, within the limits of the funds appropriated by Congress for the purpose.

Congress appropriated $75,000,000 in 1916 for a "5-year" road building program, to be allotted to the States at the rate of $15,000,000 per year.

Through all the subsequent development of the Federal aid to the States for road building the mathematical formula then prescribed by Congress for the apportionment of the funds to the separate States has remained unchanged. Congress provided that appropriations from the Federal Treasury for roads should be allotted to the States as follows: One-third in the proportions of the area of the States, one-third in proportion in their respective mileage of rural post roads and star routes.

It limited the amount payable by the Government on any road to 50 per cent of its cost and not more than $10,000 per mile. The 50 per cent of cost limit still prevails except that Congress later made special provisions for the so-called "public lands" States, where large areas were Federal domain. In those States Uncle Sam contributes an additional percentage above the 50 per cent limit, in the proportion that the public lands bear to the State's total area.

The $10,000 per mile limit was recently raised to $15,000 per mile, with a new special exception where a contribution as high as $25,000 per mile is now permitted.

It is obvious that the allocation of the total Federal road money to the States on the basis prescribed by Congress tends to favor the large and sparsely settled States. Area counts for one-third and mileage of rural post roads counts for one-third and these together greatly overbalance the population advantage enjoyed by the States in the North and East.

When the $75,000,000 appropriation was obtained in 1916 for a 5-year program it was said that this was to be the beginning and the end of the Federal road aid. But it was only the beginning.

Before the 5-year period expired it was extended for another three years, at the rate of $65,000,000 a year. Now it is on an annual and perpetual basis.

Early in Mr. Coolidge's days in the Presidency the question of Government policy with respect to Federal aid to the States for road building became an acute issue. Mr. Coolidge was against such a policy. He said then that he thought it was time for the States to pay for their own roads without looking to the Federal Treasury. He was overruled by Congress. The policy has continued.

Congress in the first year of the present administration appropriated $75,000,000 for Federal aid for a single year. The appropriation for the fiscal year of 1931 was originally $75,000,000. But in the stress of the depression and the urge of the administration for the expansion of public works, and with the recommendation of the President, Congress last winter passed an emergency appropriation of an extra $50,000,000 for Federal road contributions for the then current year, thus raising the total to $125,000,000, and appropriated $125,000,000 additional for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1932.

That was not all. Congress appropriated an additional $80,000,000 as a "loan" to the States for road building—to be allocated the same as the regular Federal road money. In theory, this extra $80,000,000 is to be deducted at some indeterminate future date from whatever road money Congress may then appropriate. As a practical matter, it is not likely to figure in future appropriations.

Thus in the 12 months ending last June the Treasury was obligated to a total of $205,000,000 for contributions to the States for highway construction in addition to the administrative costs of the United States Bureau of Public Roads, now no small item.

From small beginnings, a suite of rooms and two or three clerks, it now occupies an entire building rented by the Government for the purpose, with more than a thousand employees on its pay roll, of whom nearly 500 are engineers.

Though mileage of rural post routes and star routes is still the basis of allotment to the States, the roads in the construction of which the Federal road funds are disbursed are strictly limited to a "Federal highway system" of important interstate and intercounty roads, which have been designated and mapped some years ago. The present tendency of Congress, however, is to enlarge this system to include various rural roads "to connect the farms with the schools," and so on.

The Massachusetts highway-building program is so large, and the State's total allotment of Federal road funds so small, that there is not anywhere near enough to permit a 50–50 contribution to all of the program or even a quarter part of it.

The 50–50 Federal contribution plan has another inequality and disadvantage, so far as New England is concerned, not contemplated when it was set up by Congress. If Texas, for example, builds an intercounty macadam highway at a cost of $25,000 or $30,000 a mile, the Federal Government bears half the cost. If Massachusetts builds roads, as it is now doing and must do on account of climate conditions, in some cases at a cost of $60,000 per mile or more, the Federal Government bears one-quarter or less of the cost, because of the $15,000-per-mile limit on its contribution.

THE OUT-OF-WORK—THE STORY OF WHAT SEVERAL LEGISLATURES HAVE DONE TOWARD THE RELIEF OF JOBLESS CITIZENS

By Dr. Marietta Stevenson, American Association of Public Welfare Officials, Washington, D. C.

Last winter most people considered that the responsibility for relief of unemployment was purely local. There were a few exceptions.

Oklahoma appropriated $300,000 last January for the immediate purpose of providing food, clothing, fuel, and shelter for the relief of distress resulting from crop failures, low prices, and unemployment. An "emergency relief board" was created to distribute this relief to the counties.

Several States gave additional powers to local units in order to enable them to raise more money to aid persons or families in distress. For instance, in Ohio the Pringle-Roberts bill authorized municipal corporations, townships, or counties to borrow money to supply deficiencies in revenues available for poor relief caused by abnormal unemployment conditions and crop failures.

West Virginia, Arkansas, Louisiana, Minnesota, Missouri, and South Carolina made provision for emergency disaster relief, in cases of drought, storms, floods, etc. This relief was limited to disasters known as "acts of God."

Massachusetts appropriated nearly $3,000,000 for construction of public buildings "in order to alleviate the present unemployment emergency."

The increasing need for relief and the lack of local funds has led to a demand that the States should aid the local governments in this respect. There is a clear trend, therefore, toward the assumption by the States of responsibility for emergency relief. Several States have responded to this demand during recent months.

NEW YORK

Special sessions of several legislatures have been called to consider unemployment relief. New York was the first State to take action. Two extensive surveys of unemployment conditions had been made—one in December, 1930, and another in July, 1931—by the joint committee on unemployment relief of the State board of social welfare and the State charities aid association. In September the legislature appropriated $20,000,000 to meet the needs which were disclosed by these investigations. The money for this purpose will be raised by a 50 per cent increase in the income tax and will be expended between November 1, 1931, and May 31, 1932. The statute recognizes State responsibility for assisting localities to relieve unemployment when the local governmental units are no longer able to provide adequately for the needs of their people.

A State emergency relief administration was organized under a State commission of three, with Jesse Isidor Straus as chairman and Harry L. Hopkins as executive director. This administration is given wide powers to conduct investigations and to make regulations.

The State appropriation of $20,000,000 is to be allocated as follows:

1. Five hundred and eighty-four thousand dollars for deferred bonus payments to veterans;

2. One hundred and fourteen thousand dollars for administrative expenses of the State emergency relief administration;

3. Ten million dollars or as much thereof as may be necessary for payments to public welfare districts for home relief;

4. One million dollars for State improvements to be used for work relief;

5. Eight million three hundred and two thousand dollars for payments to city and county public welfare districts for wages for local work relief, for salaries of additional employees of city and county departments of public welfare, and for State aid for salaries of employees of emergency work bureaus.

Each city or county is made a public-welfare district and before receiving State aid, each welfare district must accept the provisions of the law. Fifty-nine cities and 49 counties have given formal notice of their intention to participate. Each city and county district which participates in the plan is entitled to receive an amount equal to 40 per cent of its expenditures for home relief to the unemployed. Even larger State payment may be granted if necessary. Home relief is defined as shelter, fuel, food, clothing, light, medicine, and medical attendance when furnished to persons in their homes. Provision is made for setting up local work bureaus, and the State funds spent for work relief are not limited to a designated proportion of the local expenditure. Pamphlets and forms have been issued by the State office for both home relief and work relief. Standards of local work are being raised by State supervision.

NEW JERSEY

The New Jersey Legislature, at a special session in October, appropriated nearly $10,000,000 for emergency relief. The State emergency relief administration set up by the statute is under the supervision of a director of emergency relief appointed by the governor. The State director is given authority to appoint a county director of relief in each county. The commissioner of institutions and agencies, the commissioner of labor, and the commissioner of municipal accounts together constitute a State administrative council responsible to the director. Subject to his direction, this council administers the detailed expenditures of State funds. The State director is given extensive powers to prescribe duties for the advisory council and county directors, to make studies of needs and resources, to establish policies, make rules and regulations, and to coordinate his work with existing national, State, or local emergency relief agencies. Each municipality and county desiring State funds must submit a program for both dependency and employment relief to be approved by the State director. Funds for work relief are granted on a population basis and municipalities are reimbursed 40 per cent of the cost of dependency relief.

Since the New Jersey plan includes 21 counties and 572 municipalities, the setting up of the machinery of administration was a complicated matter. Instructions and forms for registrars have been issued by the State in the administration of the act.

New Jersey municipalities are also authorized to issue notes or bonds for the relief of the poor during the present unemployment emergency. Another act gives counties and municipalities power to undertake public works, improvements, or other governmental activities to relieve the emergency.

RHODE ISLAND

The Governor of Rhode Island called a special session of the legislature on November 24 to ask authority to lend towns and cities money already in the general treasury, in order to provide work for the unemployed on State and municipal projects. In a legislative session lasting but one day, a statute granting this authority was passed. This statute creates a State unemployment relief commission consisting of the bank commissioner, the chairman of the board of tax commissioners, and the general treasurer, each acting ex officio. The sum of $1,500,000 was appropriated for the purchase of town notes, bonds, etc. The commission is given power to make rules and regulations, to expend money for administration, and to approve the form and substance of town notes and of the estimates of necessary relief drawn up by the town directors of public aid.

PENNSYLVANIA

A special session was called in Pennsylvania for November 9 to consider a 15-point emergency program outlined by Governor Pinchot. Governor Pinchot has time after time stated that unemployment is a national problem which should be met by the Federal Government, but he nevertheless outlined a State plan. In his message to the general assembly he laid down the following conclusions in regard to State unemployment relief. These were based on formal opinions rendered by Attorney General Schnader as to what is legally possible under the present State constitution:

1. The legislature can not make appropriations to give food, clothing, or shelter to unemployed persons and their families directly.
2. Such appropriations can not be made to a State agency.
3. They can not be made to any city, county, borough, or other political subdivision of the Commonwealth.
4. They can not be made to any welfare agency, incorporated or unincorporated.

He then outlined a plan for raising private funds and providing for extra appropriations to State departments.

The legislature refused to accept the governor's program. After prolonged discussion the Talbot bill was enacted late in December. This act made an appropriation of $10,000,000 to the department of welfare for State aid to political subdivisions charged by law with the care of the poor. The money is to be expended as follows:

1931
December	$1,000,000
1932
January	2,000,000
February	2,000,000
March	2,000,000
April	2,000,000
May	1,000,000
Total	10,000,000

This allocation is to be made to localities in the ratio that the estimated number of unemployed persons in the county bears to the estimated total number of unemployed persons in the State. The money is to be expended for food, clothing, fuel, and shelter for those in need. The governor allowed this act to become a law without his signature, but there is naturally serious question as to its constitutionality.

Before adjournment the general assembly approved other measures which brought the total relief appropriation up to $18,546,553. Four of these acts provided direct-relief appropriations and four work-relief appropriations.

ILLINOIS

An extra session was called in Illinois on November 5 to consider tax reform and relief for unemployment. The legislature has devoted most of its time to the puzzling problem of tax reform, but on February 5 a bill providing $20,000,000 for State aid was passed.

PENDING MEASURES

Governor La Follette, of Wisconsin, called a special session of their legislature for November 24 to consider unemployment relief. In his message a program was outlined which included advancement of public works, and appropriations for relief. Several bills have been introduced to put this program into effect.

A special session was called in Arizona December 28 to consider relief legislation.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I also ask that in connection with the debate a telegram from the president of the Boston Chamber of Commerce be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the telegram was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

BOSTON, MASS., February 5, 1932.

Hon. DAVID I. WALSH,
Senate Office Building, Washington, D. C.:

La Follette-Costigan bill for Federal relief for unemployed handicaps fund raising and other local efforts to meet problem now being made in Boston and other places in Commonwealth. Relief work strictly local and State problem and will be adequately met in Massachusetts as in all previous similar emergencies. Boston Chamber of Commerce believes Federal participation unwise and unnecessary and urges your vote and influence against it.

FREDERIC S. SNYDER,
President Boston Chamber of Commerce.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I was absent from the Chamber for a few moments, and I would like to ask whether the original bill has been perfected?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It has been.

Mr. GORE. I intended to offer an amendment to the original bill, but I will now offer it to the substitute. I send the amendment to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Clerk will state the amendment.

The CHIEF CLERK. The Senator from Oklahoma offers the following amendment, on page 6 of the original print, line 13, to strike out the words "in the form of money or commodities furnished to persons in their abode or habitation, or in shelters for the transient and homeless, or," so that it will read "relief in the form of wages or other compensation for work furnished."

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, this amendment would have the effect of requiring all the money appropriated under this section or title to be applied to the payment of wages for work done or services rendered. It would simply eliminate the money and the commodities. It takes out the feature which some regard as a dole. That would be the effect of the amendment.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. GORE. I yield.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I understand the amendment of the Senator from Oklahoma would prevent the payment of cash or money to any beneficiary of the act?

Mr. GORE. It would; yes.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. And would limit the disbursements, by whatever agency engaged in disbursing relief, to commodities?

Mr. GORE. No. I shall offer another amendment if this fails, as it probably will. This would strike out both money and commodities. It forbids advancing either.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. What does the Senator propose to substitute?

Mr. GORE. If this amendment shall be adopted it will limit the use of the money to the payment of wages for work done. That is the next provision in the bill as it stands. That is the point I am driving at.

I think there are perhaps some public works and some public improvements in the United States of which the country stands in need and it might at least be advisable to spend this money to secure what we need in that respect, to construct public works and improvements upon which we will spend money in the future. Let us limit this appropriation to such improvements and such work before we embark upon the boundless sea of bestowing gifts and gratuities which are unsolicited by the States.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I suggest to the Senator that he restrict his amendment to the elimination of money, so that commodities could be distributed.

Mr. GORE. Rather apprehending from the course of the debate that by some possibility this amendment may not be adopted, as it would limit the expenditure from the public Treasury, I have offered this amendment first and, assuming that it may possibly fail, I shall then offer one in line with the Senator's suggestion. I have that in mind, but I wanted to offer this amendment first because I think that the Senate ought to be convinced—I would not say convinced beyond a reasonable doubt, but the Senate ought to be convinced—that there are no public works, that there are no public improvements, of which the country stands in immediate need and to which this money could be applied before it embarks upon the boundless sea of gifts and gratuities, or loans, if you please. Call it a gift or a loan, a loan or a gift, when this money leaves the public Treasury the farewells will be equally final. The draft upon the Treasury, the burden upon the taxpayer, will be unaffected by the name. The place that once knew it will know it no more. It will never be returned. A sovereign State is an unsatisfactory debtor. All our experience with our sovereign debtors in Europe bears witness to this truth.

This, I fear, is the beginning of the dole in the United States of America. Of all the diseases known to social pathology, the passion for a pension such as this is the most debilitating. This is a civil pension. This is the dole. The disease is infectious. The disease is contagious. In the beginning the disease is acute. It soon becomes chronic, and at last, so far as the individual is concerned, the disease becomes incurable, and so far as the community is concerned the disease becomes endemic, becomes ineradicable. We can not get rid of it once it is commenced. It is a paresis of the soul and it defies all cure, defies all remedy.

That is the policy we are beginning here this day. It is a sort of moral "jake-itis," if I may without offense use that phrase. It attacks the feet—the victim can not walk. It attacks the hand—the victim can not work. It does not attack the tongue. The beneficiaries of the dole here or elsewhere will retain their voices and will join the horse leech's daughter in the cry for "more, more, more," and we will not say them "nay" when they once organize and come to the Senate in organized numbers and demand that we open the public Treasury to continue favors once begun.

"It is an appetite that grows with what it feeds upon." The fox in the fable when invited to enter the lion's den answered, "I see many tracks leading inward; I see no tracks leading outward." This step should be the last extremity. Let us try to change the conditions which brought these calamities upon us.

Mr. President, I ask for a vote on my amendment.

Mr. BULKLEY. Mr. President, it is obvious that the amendment as proposed is subversive of the whole purpose of relief. I think no one will question that the right remedy for unemployment is employment, that jobs are better than gratuities; but we are in that unfortunate situation to-day where jobs may not be had by all, where there are many who, owing to economic maladjustment, can not by any possibility get jobs. Wages on any reasonable basis will not be spread so far as the help that will be administered through the charitable agencies. Wages will not meet this part of our situation. There are also many physically incapable of performing labor, and they are in many cases as much or more in need of relief than the others. I sincerely hope that the amendment will be voted down.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, as the Senator knows, I have a great deal of respect for the opinions of the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE], but it seems to me he is taking on this question rather a hard-hearted and even cruel viewpoint. I am not contesting with him that continual giving of alms and relief has a bad effect upon the recipients, and that if we indulge in the practice any length of time the man who accepts at first with a great deal of doubt, who would much prefer some other way of getting relief through a job or something of that kind, will perhaps become an undesirable citizen.

But, Mr. President, we are confronted with a vastly more grave situation, it seems to me, than the Senator from Oklahoma anticipates. I realize that if we pass the bill or the substitute, there are some things about it that probably we will all regret more than we can say. It grieves us all to realize that we are confronted with a situation that needs this kind of a remedy. If men are suffering, if women and children are going hungry and cold on account of unemployment, we can not refuse to give relief simply because it may have a bad effect upon the recipients, and for fear that if continued indefinitely it would make mendicants and tramps of them. We can not stop on that account unless there is some other way of relieving the situation, unless we can relieve the suffering with some other remedy that is better.

Even though the method we adopt has connected with it, if continued indefinitely, something that will lead to results that are undesirable, we can not stop on that account. We can not sit idly by and see our fellow human beings suffering and dying for the want of food, with granaries bursting with an oversupply of things the starving people need. We must meet a desperate situation with remedies that are perhaps somewhat desperate. We are not legislating to cure an ordinary evil of daily occurrence. If anyone can suggest any remedy that is better than any of the remedies which have been here suggested, that will do the work, for one I would be delighted to follow him. But think as we may, study as we will, no one yet has found, in my judgment, any other plan of relief to meet the present situation.

Notwithstanding that what the Senator from Oklahoma said is good philosophy as a fundamental proposition, we can not follow it now. We can not do that temporarily. If we do, while we are following our fundamental ideas of what is proper, our people will be dying. Other millions will be suffering for something to eat and shivering with cold for lack of something to wear. These are emergencies, it seems to me, Mr. President, that can not be settled, that can not be dealt with, that can not be met under the ordinary procedure of legislation. Therefore it seems to me that we ought not to expect—so far as I am concerned I do not expect—a return of the money that is to be used. It is too much to ask that men who have nothing with which even to feed themselves and their families should be able to pay a note if they gave a note for their present emergency needs and their present emergency relief.

I do not care what it may be called. It may be called a dole, if you wish. That has to me no powerful significance. I do not call it such; but, if others' definition is different from mine and if it is a dole, then let it be a dole. It is a necessity at least, and it does not feed the poor and clothe the naked if we say we will not give relief because the giving of relief would be a dole. These people are suffering from no illegal or wrongful acts of their own. Most of those who will be relieved will be children, innocent of any wrongdoing. Men who have lost their jobs are not to blame because this terrible depression has come down upon the world and cut off their only source of revenue and livelihood. It is not a question of those people seeking alms. It is a question of life. It is a question of saving those who are suffering from a lack of the necessaries of life, and all rules and regulations that apply to the healthy and normal conditions of things do not apply here and now.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I have great respect for the heart and head of the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS], and when I find myself differing from him it always raises a question as to the soundness of my own views and my own position.

Mr. President, if sympathy alone could be our only guide, our task would be an easy task. I believe that I feel as keen a sympathy for the unemployed as any Senator upon this floor. I think that every human being, man or woman, who needs employment, who wants employment, who seeks employment and is unable to find it, is a living tragedy. It arouses sympathy and compassion in every man, in or out of this Chamber. But there are other considerations than sympathy alone. Some one has said that statesmanship consists in computing secondary reactions. Almost anyone can tell what the first reaction will be. The obvious, the inevitable consequence can be seen by the man who runs and reads. But we ought to compute secondary reactions.

What I mean is that the final effect of our legislation, the ultimate and enduring consequences, are the standards by which our wisdom will ultimately be judged. I doubt not that the ultimate effect of this legislation will be undesirable, as it affects the character of our American citizenship.

If it should undermine self-reliance or self-respect, I am old-fashioned enough to think that the virtues which have made us great must keep us great. My immediate purpose in offering this amendment is that the money be applied to the payment of wages upon necessary public works and improvements. I have no doubt but that local relief will be adequate to take care of the children and of helpless women. The men who are capable of work, if they need help, would prefer to receive it in the form of wages rather than in the form of alms or a dole. I would like to relieve their distress without crushing their spirit.

Mr. President, the danger that I apprehend has been illustrated in this Chamber in connection with the history of this very measure. The original bill came in here authorizing an appropriation of $375,000,000. That measure, sponsored by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] and the Senator from Colorado [Mr. COSTIGAN], was based on hearings which lasted for weeks and weeks, running even into months. As a result of their deliberate judgment, perhaps better advised than any Members of this Chamber, after all the picture of distress and of agony was presented, they reported a measure authorizing the appropriation of $375,000,000. But, sir, the spirit of competition sprang up; the tendency which I dread became manifest, and leading Senators on this side of the Chamber, upon what additional data I do not know, brought in a substitute doubling the amount proposed by the original sponsors of this legislation, increasing it to $750,000,000. I make no particular point of that.

A suggestion has been made that the amount be increased to a billion dollars. Why not? It has even been intimated here, if I understood the course of the debate, that a State should be allowed to replenish its treasury or to reimburse its own expenditures from the appropriation for these benevolent humanitarian objects. Why not? Unless that be done there is a danger that possibly some of this money might be left in the Treasury of the United States.

So we have seen illustrated here the dangerous tendency of this kind of legislation. I do not know what governors have overwhelmed the Senate with their requests for Federal charity. It seems to me that Senators are rather outrunning themselves to thrust this donation upon unsoliciting States. We begin here in a spirit of philanthropy and of charity. We will continue it under an imperious demand—I will not say duress—when the beneficiaries become organized. Senators know what I mean. Mr. President, I did not intend to delay the Senate so long.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Oklahoma to the amendment in the nature of a substitute.

The amendment to the proposed substitute was rejected.

Mr. GORE. I now move to strike out the words "money or commodities" and to insert the words "food, fuel, and clothing."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will state the amendment proposed by the Senator from Oklahoma to the amendment in the nature of a substitute.

Mr. NORRIS. Before he does so let me ask a question. I was unable to find the prior amendment proposed by the Senator from Oklahoma in the copy of the substitute which I have on my desk. Evidently there is another print of the measure being used.

Mr. GORE. The amendment which I offered was not printed, I will say to the Senator.

Mr. NORRIS. I understand that, but the amendment is to the substitute, as I understand?

Mr. GORE. Yes, sir; it is.

Mr. NORRIS. I am trying to locate in the substitute amendment the point where the Senator proposes his amendment.

Mr. GORE. I think it is in section 8, page 6.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will state the amendment to the proposed substitute.

The CHIEF CLERK. In the original text, page 6, line 13, the first amendment of the Senator from Oklahoma was to strike out the words "in the form of money or commodities furnished to persons in their abode or habitation, or in shelters for the transient and homeless or." In the original text the Senator from Oklahoma now proposes to strike out, in line 13, the words "money or commodities" and insert the words "food, fuel, and clothing."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Oklahoma to the substitute.

Mr. GORE. I do not care to discuss the amendment.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. GORE. I move to strike out the words "money or." I wish to say just a word on this amendment. I offered the other amendment, which I did not discuss, substituting for money and commodities "food, fuel, and clothing," which would include the prime necessaries of the needy and the unfortunate whom we are seeking to serve. The word "commodities," as will be found in the dictionary, means everything that may be bought or sold except livestock. I thought it would be wise to limit the expenditure to necessaries.

Mr. President, I believe—and the Senator from Wisconsin or the Senator from Colorado can correct me if I am in error—that all social workers recommend that food, fuel, and clothing, or orders on grocery stores, be given instead of giving money outright. I took occasion last summer in Oklahoma City to confer with all the agencies, excepting one, that administer charity, that perform welfare work or unemployment work or extend unemployment relief. As I understand, it is their uniform belief that it is unwise to give money; that charity should be extended in the form of necessaries. It is economical and goes to the purposes for which the charity is intended.

I have had this incident called to my attention by a person who was, I believe, on the welfare board in Detroit. There they issued checks or gave money, as I understand, and one individual who was arrested for speeding turned in his relief check in part payment of his fine. [Laughter.] That showed a great deal of ingenuity, thrift, and adaptation to circumstances, showing that he could meet occasions as they arose. But Senators, seriously, it is unwise to give money as such. I think that all the relief agencies pursue and recommend a different course.

Mr. President, I ask to have printed in the RECORD a letter from Col. John H. Leavell, of Tulsa, Okla., who is connected with relief work and is receiving requests from different parts of the country for information as to the plan which has been put into operation at Tulsa. There they have worked out a system under which the needy are fed at an outlay of 6 cents a day on a wholesome diet, as this communication indicates. The system is being adopted by other communities. I myself know nothing of its sufficiency and do not pass judgment upon it, but I make the letter available in the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the letter will be printed in the RECORD.

The letter is as follows:

LEAVELL COAL CO.,
Tulsa, Okla., February 8, 1932.

Senator THOS. P. GORE,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: In answer to your letter about the first of the year, in which you told me you desired to put into the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD the results I am accomplishing here in Tulsa, I inclose a pamphlet, which I have been compelled to write in response to numerous requests from cities and individuals over the country.

It may interest you to know that while furnishing these foodstuffs at 6 cents per day we have accumulated a surplus of $2,000 and we vary the ration each week.

For the past three weeks we have been giving grapefruit at twice the amount of tomatoes by weight.

If you do see fit to put this into the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, or any part of it, I would highly appreciate your sending me a copy of it.

Thanking you again for the compliment, I am,

Most sincerely yours,

JOHN H. LEAVELL.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, I hope the amendment proposed by the Senator from Oklahoma to the substitute will be adopted. I have observed for a good many years a vast amount of relief work conducted in the various communities in my State, and I have known of only one community where cash or money has been distributed, and in that community occurred the only instance of which I have ever heard where charges of waste and abuses of the principle of relief were made. For more than a century Massachusetts has found the plan of relief given free from cash distributions most satisfactory.

The relief method of distributing food, orders upon grocery stores, orders for clothing, and paying the landlord for rent has worked very satisfactorily, indeed, and I should very much regret to see any departure from that practice in the direction of distributing money or making cash payments to those who apply for public aid. I hope the amendment will be adopted.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Oklahoma to the amendment in the nature of a substitute.

The amendment to the amendment in the nature of a substitute was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment in the nature of a substitute as amended.

Mr. TRAMMELL. I desire to move an amendment to the proposed substitute amendment. On page 6, in line 4, after the word "expended," I move to insert:

And included in such report shall be the name of each person employed in the administration of such relief, the character of service performed, and the salary of each.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Florida to the amendment in the nature of a substitute.

The amendment to the amendment in the nature of a substitute was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question now is on agreeing to the amendment in the nature of a substitute as amended.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE and Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas called for the yeas and nays.

Mr. NORRIS. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The Chief Clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

The VICE PRESIDENT. Eighty-four Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present.

Mr. HATFIELD. Mr. President, I am not quite sure as to when I should offer my amendment—whether it should be offered to the substitute that is now pending, or whether I should withhold my amendment and offer it after this amendment has been voted upon.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair will state that if the substitute should be agreed to, it would then be too late to offer the Senator's amendment.

Mr. HATFIELD. In that case, I wish to offer the amendment now.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment to the amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. The Senator from West Virginia offers the following amendment in the nature of a substitute for the so-called Black-Walsh-Bulkley amendment:

Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"That there is hereby authorized to be appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $275,000,000, one-third of which shall be immediately available, for loans by the Secretary of the Treasury to the several States, in the manner hereinafter provided. Not more than $100,000,000 of this amount shall be loaned during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1932.

"SEC. 2. (a) Out of the amounts appropriated pursuant to section 1, the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized and empowered to make loans to the several States, in the proportion which their population bears to the total population of the States of the United States according to the Fifteenth Decennial Census. Such apportionment shall be made by the Secretary of the Treasury within 10 days after an appropriation has been made under the authority of this act.

"(b) Each application for a loan under the provisions of this act shall be made by the governor of the State. Loans to the States in the amount hereinbefore authorized shall be made by the Secretary of the Treasury, but no loans shall be made to any State until the governor has furnished the Secretary of the Treasury, under rules and regulations prescribed by the Secretary of the Treasury, notes, debentures, bonds, or other obligations of the State in an amount equal to the amount of the loan. Loans may be made from time to time until the State has received the full amount to which it is entitled under such authorization. Such loans shall bear interest at not more than 5 per cent and shall mature not more than five years from the date of the loan.

"(c) If any loan made to a State under the provisions of this act has not been repaid at the expiration of five years from the date of the loan, there shall be deducted in each year thereafter, and applied to the discharge of the principal and interest of such loan, an amount equal to one-fifth of the sum that would otherwise be paid to such State by virtue of allocations from any appropriation or appropriations that may be made pursuant to or to carry out the purposes of the Federal highway act, as amended.

"SEC. 3. There is also hereby authorized to be appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $100,000,000 for expenditure by the Secretary of the Treasury for the construction, enlarging, remodeling, or extension of public buildings under the control of the Treasury Department in cities for which allocations have heretofore been made, but for which estimates have not been submitted to Congress. Such amount may be expended without regard to the provisions of section 4 of the public buildings act of May 25, 1926, as amended, requiring the submission of estimates to the Bureau of the Budget, and the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized to fix the limit of cost for each of such projects. Expenditures for professional services may be made from such amount without regard to any act limiting expenditures for outside professional services. Such amount shall be in addition to any amounts heretofore authorized under such act of May 25, 1926, as amended, and except as herein otherwise provided shall be expended in accordance with existing law.

"SEC. 4. The Secretary of the Treasury is authorized to make all rules and regulations necessary to carry out the provisions of this act."

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator will state it.

Mr. NORRIS. Would not that amendment be proper, no matter whether the substitute is voted in or out?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Not if the substitute should be adopted. Then this amendment would not be in order.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, is it not an amendment in the third degree?

The VICE PRESIDENT. It is not, under Rule XVIII. The other is a motion to strike out and insert.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. This is the same motion. The pending question is the substitute, and this is a substitute for the substitute. How many degrees removed can we be under the parliamentary practice as espoused by the Vice President?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Under the rule, where there is a motion to strike out and insert, both the original matter and the substitute amendment may be amended, each, for the purpose of amendment, being regarded as a question.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I am not particularly interested in this particular case; but I should hate to have the Chair establish a precedent that might be the cause of trouble later. I understand that there are several other substitutes. Does the Chair hold now that for any substitute to be in order it must be offered as a substitute for the substitute? If that is the case, then it would be impossible for the Senator from West Virginia, for instance, to offer his substitute in the place of the original bill. If this is voted in now, for instance—the one that we have the roll call called for now—would it not be in order then to offer a substitute? That would become the bill then. This amendment is offered, not as a substitute for the bill itself, but as a substitute for the substitute.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair will hold that the question is on the substitute proposed by the Senator from West Virginia.

Mr. NORRIS. Is it a substitute for the substitute, or is it a substitute for the original bill?

The VICE PRESIDENT. It is a substitute for the substitute offered by the Senator from Alabama.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, should the substitute of the Senator from West Virginia be rejected, would it be in order to offer another substitute, or, should it be accepted, would it be in order, then, to offer a substitute for the substitute of the Senator from West Virginia? [Laughter.]

Mr. NORRIS. As I understand the matter, I think the question propounded by the Senator from Arkansas is a perfectly proper one.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Certainly it is.

Mr. NORRIS. Suppose this substitute is agreed to. I understand that some other Senators—at least two that I have heard of—have substitutes for this bill. The action on this substitute would preclude them from ever offering their substitutes, it seems to me, if the Chair is right and if we agree to this substitute. If it is rejected, I can understand how another substitute might be offered; but it seems to me the Chair is leading us into this dilemma:

Suppose the substitute upon which we are about to vote now is agreed to; then no other substitute can be offered, and Senators who have substitutes that they want to offer will never have an opportunity to do it. They will be precluded from offering an amendment in the way of a substitute.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I desire to propound a parliamentary inquiry.

Is not the situation this: If the substitute now pending, offered by the Senators from Alabama and Montana and Ohio, is agreed to, then the Senator from West Virginia may subsequently offer what he now proposes as an amendment to the substitute adopted by the Senate. In other words, he has not lost his opportunity. If the substitute now pending is not agreed to, undoubtedly the Senator from West Virginia will have the opportunity to offer his proposal then; so that he loses nothing by a holding now that it is not in order.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from West Virginia to the amendment in the nature of a substitute. The Senator from West Virginia is recognized.

Mr. HATFIELD. Mr. President, I realize that the conditions which confront millions of our people at the present time may well be considered an emergency; and because of such belief I am willing to vote for such legislation that should be enacted only in cases of a national emergency.

The heroic efforts which are being put forward by the President, which entail at the present time an expenditure of $60,000,000 a month by the Federal Treasury in construction projects which will last for some years, should convince every citizen that nothing that can be done has been left undone by the administration.

This is very evident when we take into consideration the relief legislation which the Congress has enacted on the recommendation of President Hoover in the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, the farm-bank legislation for the relief of home owners with mortgages on real estate, agricultural relief, and other relief legislation in the process of completion.

These actions upon the part of Congress, in cooperation with the President, indicate to me that every effort possible is being made to help those of our people who are unable to secure needed employment; and from past experience I have no hesitancy in saying that continued cooperation upon the part of the Congress with the President, following lines which have proven fruitful in the past, will soon bring us out of the emergency in which we find our people at this time.

I have no objection to voting money from the Federal Treasury for cooperative work in the States. When opportunity has been presented to me, I have whole-heartedly registered my vote in favor of such a principle.

The same policy is practiced by the respective legislatures of the States in cooperation with county units in many ways and for many purposes.

I have no hesitancy in voting to take care of an emergency or catastrophe where the end can be seen; and I shall have no hesitancy in voting to place the Treasury of the Federal Government in a position to furnish credit to the States in this emergency. I can not, however, bring myself to the point of being convinced that I should vote for a direct appropriation from the Federal Government as being the way out of the situation which confronts the Congress at this time.

For Congress to place the National Treasury in a position to extend credits in the form of moneys to the States is more practical and unquestionably more equitable, in that each unit of government will be left to stand on its own responsibilities to those of its citizens who are in need or relief.

I need not dwell on the fact, apparent to all, that the States, through their subdivisions and through officials elected by their own people, are in a better position to know the wants and the needs of their own citizens than any agency which could be created by the Federal Government.

As indicating that citizens of the States prefer a loan and not a gift I call attention to the fact that of the $60,000,000 loaned to farmers in the drought-stricken areas, more than 75 per cent has been repaid, if I am correctly informed.

I do not believe that the bills presented to the Senate—the Costigan-La Follette bill or the Bulkley-Black-Walsh bill—will meet the approval of either the other branch of Congress or the President of the United States.

In making this statement I am predicating it on the previous actions of both the House and the President of the United States.

The amendment which I have proposed is in line with the past policy of our Government and is in keeping with the message of the President of the United States in which he said:

> In order that the Government may meet its full obligation toward our countrymen in distress through no fault of their own, I recommend that an appropriation should be made to the Department of Agriculture to be loaned—

And so forth.

I am opposed to the creation of any new Federal bureaus. Incidentally, it has been my observation that Federal bureaus once authorized seldom pass out of existence. I do not believe that economic conditions at the present time warrant us in enlarging any of the present bureaus.

My amendment will not add any additional expense to the Federal Government other than for the construction of public buildings which are much needed.

The idea of making it possible for the States which need financial assistance to secure such assistance from the Federal Government is as far as I am willing to go, and I believe it is the only sound and practical method for the Congress to adopt.

Such credits made possible through the Federal Treasury will place the States in a position to work out their own obligations to their dependent citizens, will eliminate that form of bureaucracy which is obnoxious and in many instances almost impossible to deal with in a satisfactory way.

The only requirement to be met by the States in order to secure the moneys which at present they are unable to obtain would be to furnish proper securities for the money loaned by the Treasury, which loans would be liquidated within a short period of time.

I understand that there are inhibitory clauses in the constitutions of some of the States which would prevent the States from obtaining money by loans under the amendment suggested by me. But the State of West Virginia, has a constitution that is as old as the Government itself, taken largely from the constitution of the mother State, and I can hardly understand how there is a State in the Union whose constitution does not include a clause which would permit the State, through its governor or other proper authority, to negotiate a loan in order to take care of a casual deficit. There is such a provision in the constitution of West Virginia, and when I was the governor of that State I negotiated loans to take care of casual deficits.

Of course, I appreciate the fact that in other States there may be inhibitory clauses in the constitutions which would prevent such action. I am sorry for any State whose constitution is so framed, but I feel that this amendment represents the type of legislation which should appeal to every Senator and to every Representative because of its equity and its fairness, and, again, because it fixes upon one of the major units of the Government the responsibility of taking care of its own citizenship.

Again, the amendment would permit each State unit of government to handle entirely its own affairs, as was originally intended by our forefathers.

The treatment, care, and handling of governmental relief in this way will obviate any unnecessary expenditures of money.

I do not believe that the Federal Government should, without a specific request from a State or States, invade the borders of any State to carry on the activities of government which have so long and so well been administered by the officials of the States and the subdivisions thereof. So far as I have been able to learn the chief executive of only one State has appeared in Washington and advocated the enactment of relief legislation by the Congress.

I believe it will be admitted by every Member of the Senate that no State should ask Congress for funds for relief of the people of its State unless the people of that State are willing to do something themselves to relieve their own distressed and needy people.

In the case of the executive of the one State who appeared in favor of the Costigan-La Follette bill before the committee, I note in his testimony that his own State is unable, under the laws made by the people of that State, to extend the form of relief to their own people which he advocated the Congress should afford.

With all due respect for the intentions and the ability of the social-service experts who so strongly advocate the appropriation of Federal money to be spent directly for relief, I for one am unwilling to place the requests of those good people above the requests of the officials duly elected by the people themselves.

I do not believe that we are warranted at this time in making extraordinary appropriations for road building. Under present-day methods of construction, money spent for public road building is in most cases allotted for the use of machinery, and, to my mind, only a small percentage of such funds finds its way into the pockets of the skilled workers.

I am keenly interested in the enactment of some legislation which will provide employment for skilled American artisans, labor of a type which constitutes the largest group of workers, who, in order to hold their jobs, have developed an intellect and skill which we must and which we will recognize.

It is my understanding that of the million or more building-trade mechanics constituting the membership of the building-trades department of the American Federation of Labor, less than 30 per cent have had even part-time work during the past year. These workers for the most part are well paid, a large percentage of them own their own homes, have families, and are not migratory or casual labor.

In addition, through the wages they have been able to secure, they have maintained a standard of living for their associates which constitutes in great part the backbone of the purchasing and consuming power of the wage workers of America.

As few of these workers are employed in the building of roads, I feel we could use money appropriated out of the Treasury to be spent for employment relief in such ways that a larger percentage of the money we spend would find its way into the pockets of those who need employment relief.

Therefore the amendment I have proposed will permit of the spending of $100,000,000 to be used by the Treasury Department in the construction of public buildings. These buildings have already been allocated, and in many cases authorized. The construction of these buildings will render a real service to the country, and the buildings can be erected under present-day conditions at a tremendous saving to the Government, and their construction at this time will provide real employment relief for those who really need such employment.

The appropriation of the sum provided for public buildings will furnish much-needed employment also for those engaged in the fabrication of materials used in the construction of the buildings.

The railroads and railroad men will be benefited in the hauling of these commodities. The coal miner will be benefited in the use of coal needed for power and heat. Above all, it will provide actual work for that type of American labor which needs work and not charity.

The legislation which I have proposed will provide honest wages for those with families, and it will naturally be spent by those men and their families for food, benefiting the farmers; for clothing and shoes, benefiting other types of labor; and will benefit our local communities in that cities, towns, and villages will be able to collect taxes from the small-home owners, a condition which seemingly is not realized by some of the speakers who have preceded me.

I will not knowingly be a party to mere gestures or vote for legislation simply on the basis of political expediency. Since entering this body, and during my entire public life, I have tried to be a party, by my vote and my voice, to that type of legislation for which there is justifiable reason for believing it will be enacted into law.

I realize that our system of government provides that action upon the part of one House of Congress must meet the approval of the other branch of Congress and, in addition thereto, must be approved by the President. Personally I do not believe that there is any substantial number of Senators who believe that either the so-called Costigan-La Follette relief bill or the Bulkley-Black-Walsh relief bill will meet the approval of the other branch of Congress and be approved by the President of the United States.

Therefore, realizing as I do the need for beneficial emergency legislation at this time, I have proposed an amendment which, while I am not authorized to speak for the membership of the House of Representatives or the President of the United States, is in keeping with the principle of legislation which this Congress has already enacted, and which has met the approval of the President of the United States.

If my assumption is correct, the legislation which I propose will not provide a dole, will not make the recipients of the Nation's generosity carry the badge of charity, but will permit those working on public buildings to receive American wages in return for American workmanship.

The other feature of the bill will permit the State, through its chief executive, or legislative body, to secure funds from the Treasury of the United States in return for promissory notes or bonds which, owing to the present financial situation, they might not otherwise be able to secure.

It will permit the States to provide the relief which the State officials know is needed. It will safeguard the rights of the State.

Mr. President, one of our greatest troubles to-day is the fear upon the part of our people which has actuated the hoarding of a billion and a half dollars. This has come about through the depreciation of securities. Some Government bonds have been selling in the eighties. I am told that banking institutions, due to fear on the part of the average depositor, hesitate to loan any large sums of money even on Government bonds. I am not blaming the banks; it is their duty to be able to meet the depositors' wishes for funds on demand.

However, it seems to me that if we pass legislation which will give away three or four hundred millions of dollars we will simply further depreciate the securities of our Government, and when these securities depreciate I know of no other securities which will not also further depreciate.

Mr. President, as stated before, I believe a national emergency exists. I have read with interest the hearings held upon the subject of unemployment relief, and most of the testimony was controversial as to the actual necessity for Federal assistance in the extension of relief within the States, I observe, and I observed that most of those who gave testimony appeared as individuals and not as official representatives of organizations or institutions whose primary purpose is relief. Anyone who will read the hearings will be forcibly impressed by the absence, with one or two exceptions, of any official representative of a sovereign State. This failure of the States to officially plead or advocate Federal aid for relief within their boundaries is conclusive proof that the States do not desire aid in the form of charity, and it is in this form the present measure before us voluntarily offers it.

The only State executive whose testimony appeared in the record of the hearing, the Hon. Gifford Pinchot, among other things, stated:

> My plan to borrow money from them [referring to the wealthy people of the State of Pennsylvania] to be repaid by a bond issue would have been an effort in that direction.

That would be in line with the proposed amendment which I have presented for consideration on the part of the Senate.

As a representative of the people of West Virginia and wishing to have first-hand information as to the wishes of the people of my State, I sent a telegram to a number of newspapers and several of the State officials.

The telegram which I sent read as follows:

> La Follette-Costigan bill now before the Senate provides for allocation to the various States of $375,000,000 partly on basis of population for relief in form of money and commodities to needy and distressed unemployed. Please contact proper authorities and with their conclusions and your knowledge of conditions wire me immediately if this form of relief in part a gratuity from Federal Treasury is justified by unemployed situation and economic conditions in West Virginia. An amendment to bill provides an additional $375,000,000 allocated to States for road construction.

In answer to this telegram I received several replies. First is a letter from the Hon. H. C. Ogden, editor and publisher of a group of newspapers numbering 14 or 15 in the State of West Virginia. I send the letter to the desk and ask to have the Clerk read it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the clerk will read, as requested.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

THE WHEELING NEWS—THE WHEELING INTELLIGENCER,
Wheeling, W. Va., February 13, 1932.

Hon. H. D. HATFIELD,
Member of the United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR: I have your telegram in regard to the La Follette-Costigan bill.

My own reaction is against the bill, and is against anything either resembling a dole or contribution on the part of the Federal Government in relief work through the States.

In the first place, this is an invasion of our principle of local self-government, which has really been one of the bulwarks of this Republic. Everything that tends to centralize money at Washington, the collection of money and the distribution of money at Washington, tends to break down local initiative and finally to destroy local institutions.

Second. I am sure that, so far as Wheeling is concerned, and the northern part of the State is concerned, the needy are being taken care of. I think we are taking care of them this year even better than last, because we have learned how.

Third. There would be a painful amount of waste if the Government undertook this distribution. It simply means setting up a half dozen more commissions and bureaus, and employing 50 or 100 more agencies at Washington, a lot of fighting among the States and counties for the benefits to be derived, and a very great resultant dissatisfaction.

Fourth, and perhaps the greatest objection is this. The Federal Government now has a deficit of over $2,000,000,000. This deficit is going to have to be made up by extraordinary taxation. Almost inevitably this taxation will take the form of increased income taxes, and will fall heaviest upon business activities; in other words, those activities that employ labor and distribute pay rolls. If, instead of increasing the income tax, it could be decreased, you would furnish an enormous stimulus to business. We know that it has to be increased, probably, but to make another increase without absolute necessity would be most unwise.

Let me illustrate: Suppose you have a business in which you are doing a business of $100,000 annually. You work hard with a moderate degree of success and increase that business to $125,000 annually. Then suppose you have a normal profit of from 8 to 10 per cent; that you sell on 60 days' time. When you increase your business to $125,000 annually, if you have no losses whatsoever, you absorb about 20 per cent of this increase in your accounts receivable, or namely, $5,000. You probably increase your inventory, which, let us say, was $20,000 on the $100,000 basis, to $25,000, absorbing $5,000 more. Let us say that on the $100,000 business you make $10,000 profit, and paid $1,100 income tax. On the $125,000 business you made $12,500 profit, and paid $1,370 income tax. Your condition to the end of the second year will be that you will have absorbed all of your profits in accounts receivable, and additional income tax, and so far as being in an easier position is concerned, you will be just as hard up, if not harder up than you were at the beginning of the first year. Now this is an illustration of a successful business.

If you vary it by taking the experience of only a moderately successful business, or one that meets some misfortune, you can see that it may easily happen that the payment of the income tax would drive such a concern to the creation of a new debt. Now, if you increase the income tax from 11 per cent to 15 or 16 per cent, you aggravate the situation. The income tax has the effect of gradually forcing the contraction of all business instead of stimulating its expansion. Most Federal Government taxes have this effect because they fall upon business transactions, or upon trade; in other words, the processes which increase the value of commodities and employment. Under present conditions it would be next to a crime unnecessarily to increase the income-tax rates.

Instead of arranging to spend more money the Federal Government should arrange to cut its expenditures to the limit. There is no State, and I don't think, any city, or county in the United States that can not take care of its needs if it buckles down and tries to, and can take care of them with a great deal less expense, and make every dollar go a great deal farther than it ever will go if spent by the Federal Government.

Relative to the above I just talked to your friend, Hon. Robert Hazlett, head of our biggest bank, who agrees with it thoroughly.

I am sending you this to-night because you said "immediately" in your telegram. I will send you Monday statements from other men of importance in the business world here in Wheeling, and also from the heads of our charitable organizations.

With kind regards, I am, yours very truly,

H. C. OGDEN.

Mr. HATFIELD. Mr. President, I send to the desk to be read by the clerk a telegram from the tax commissioner of the State of West Virginia, signed jointly by him, the treasurer of the State, and the auditor of the State.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the clerk will read, as requested.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

CHARLESTON, W. VA., February 15, 1932.

H. D. HATFIELD,
United States Senate:

We urge that you endeavor in connection with the pending emergency legislation to provide a method whereby the Federal Government may be given authority to advance money to the States where ordinary facilities of credit are not now available because of conditions that have existed in the financial markets. The State of West Virginia has always enjoyed splendid credit, and its bonds have always been readily sold at a premium. At this time, however, some five to ten millions of authorized State-road bonds can not be marketed, and, unless some temporary means of credit can be provided through the Federal Government, road work, which employs a considerable number of people in this State, can not be carried on under the plan authorized by the State legislature. Some $2,000,000 of the State funds are tied up in closed bank, with the result that there is a large deficit in the State-road fund. The Governor of West Virginia has authority under the constitution and laws to borrow money to meet casual deficits, and this State would be in position to take advantage of any credit facilities the Federal Government might provide. Our State treasury is facing a serious crisis. It would be highly beneficial if temporary credit can be arranged, thereby making it possible to market State-road bonds and thaw out frozen assets. Similar conditions obtain also in some of our counties. You can render a great service to the State of West Virginia and its political subdivisions if some practicable plan can be worked out whereby credit through the Federal Government can be made available in this situation.

W. S. JOHNSON, State Treasurer.
EDGAR C. LAWSON, State Auditor.
T. C. TOWNSEND, State Tax Commissioner.

Mr. HATFIELD. Mr. President, the obligation upon the part of the State of West Virginia as represented in bond issues over different periods, which include the local units of government, amounts to about $160,000,000. The State of West Virginia embarked upon a road-construction program following the election of 1920, in which a constitutional amendment was adopted authorizing the issuing of $50,000,000 of road bonds. The amendment was adopted by an overwhelming majority. The expenditure of the $50,000,000 thus authorized by a direct vote of the people has resulted in the building and ramification of roads in every section of the State. Until the day when West Virginia, with her hills and valleys, was confronted with the present economic depression we have had no trouble in selling those bonds at an attractive price in the bond market. Until the depression period came we have had a tremendous personnel employed by the State, through the road department of that Commonwealth, in the building of roads. Unless the State can find some avenue by which to float the $10,000,000 of available bonds in the very near future the road department will have to cease its work, and when that happens, of course, a great many people who are now employed will be added to the number of unemployed.

What I am hoping is that there may be found in this Union a sufficient number of States that have a clause in their constitutions that will permit the governors to borrow money, and that the Federal Treasury will be used as a facility through which loans can be negotiated.

In that way the chief executive of the State of West Virginia can extend relief to each and every county within the confines of the State. In no other way, in my judgment, can relief be given to the State of West Virginia, and I doubt not that there are many other States in the same position at the present time. This surely is true of cities, municipalities, and lesser units of government within all of the States.

I send to the desk at this time numerous telegrams from newspaper publishers throughout West Virginia, for which I ask unanimous consent to be printed in the RECORD in connection with my remarks.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The telegrams are as follows:

HINTON, W. VA., February 15, 1932.

Senator H. D. HATFIELD:
Sentiment opposed to La Follette-Costigan. Approve amendment.

HINTON DAILY NEWS.

CHARLESTON, W. VA., February 15, 1932.

Hon. H. D. HATFIELD,
United States Senate:
Rewire. State road commission in 1931 had an average monthly pay roll of 3,000 people, and paid out in wages and salaries $3,220,000. In addition to this, between 3,500 and 4,000 persons were employed by road contractors, and their pay roll amounted to $4,000,000.

WALTER S. HALLAHAN.

FAIRMONT, W. VA., February 13, 1932.

Senator H. D. HATFIELD,
Senate Office Building:
Practically no sentiment here in favor of the La Follette-Costigan bill. Local situation well in hand with the Quakers feeding the mine-camp children at their schoolhouses. This newspaper feels that the bill is wrong in principle and a trouble breeder.

THE WEST VIRGINIAN.

HUNTINGTON, W. VA., February 14, 1932.

Senator HENRY D. HATFIELD,
Washington, D. C.:
Replying to your request, I regard the La Follette-Costigan bill as dangerous in principle and of greatest immediate benefit only to large population centers. Nevertheless, I believe that support would be popular for the time being, but am confident that opposition, although immediately unpopular, would be justified after a period of years. Naturally our unemployment is proportionate, and I can readily see a measure of relief, but this will come substantially through the administration's program.

JIM CLENDENIN.

RONCEVERTE, W. VA., February 13, 1932.

Senator HENRY D. HATFIELD:
Best opinion here is that conditions do not warrant anything resembling dole from Government. Believe would retard normal recovery. Highway construction has too long ignored development of local commerce and industry and has destructively dislocated the business of railroads, an important contributing factor to depression. Unless justified by utility of roads to be constructed amount of employment provided negligible and too transitory for outlay.

WM. B. BLAKE, Jr.
Editor West Virginia News.

MOUNDSVILLE, W. VA., February 13, 1932.

Senator H. D. HATFIELD:
Your telegram on Federal relief. I find no sentiment here for charity on population or political basis. Charities leaders, public officials think Federal Treasury help should be last resort. Moundsville, Marshall County, taking care of themselves. Am writing you more fully.

W. L. MENGERT,
Editor The Journal.

WILLIAMSON, W. VA., February 13, 1932.

Senator H. D. HATFIELD,
Washington, D. C.:
Unemployment relief in Mingo County certainly does not indicate necessity for anything resembling a dole. Through the Red Cross and other agencies, situation is well taken care of. Public opinion, we feel sure, is against the La Follette-Costigan bill. Consensus here is the millions for dole will tend to confirm the habit of idleness in many and will react in greatly increased taxes upon a citizenry already overburdened with taxes.

H. G. CLARK,
Editor Williamson Daily News.

MARTINSBURG, W. VA., February 13, 1932.

Senator HENRY D. HATFIELD,
Senate Building:
Informed sentiment here sees no necessity La Follette-Costigan fund. Cases this section cared for local funds without difficulty. Outright appropriation not favored. No strong sentiment for road amendment, either.

EVENING JOURNAL.

PARKERSBURG, W. VA., February 13, 1932.

Senator H. D. HATFIELD:
Parkersburg area is caring for its own needy and distressed, and major sentiment here is strongly against Federal dole. Feeling is that respective States should care for their own poor when other than local assistance is necessary.

JOHN W. FISCHER,
Editor Parkersburg Sentinel.

CHARLESTON, W. VA., February 13, 1932.

Hon. H. D. HATFIELD,
United States Senate:
Answering your telegram, we believe that the intelligent opinion of the State disapproves these measures, particularly the $375,000,000 dole. As for us, we are most earnestly opposed to it. The local units of population are able to care for their own distressed people, and in West Virginia this is being proven in many places.

THE CHARLESTON DAILY MAIL,
By WALTER E. CLARK.

LOGAN, W. VA., February 13, 1932.

Senator H. D. HATFIELD,
Senate Building:
A meeting already scheduled for Monday night, of county business leaders, to discuss unemployment with American Legion. I will present your message and send night letter. From personal knowledge of Logan County conditions I doubt very much the need of such relief measure, but the amendment sounds interesting. Have heard much favorable comment on your radio talk last night.

CLARENCE H. FREY,
The Logan Banner.

BUCKHANNON, W. VA., February 13, 1932.

Senator H. D. HATFIELD:
Re telegram. Sentiment here opposes bill. Less opposition to amendment.

THE REPUBLICAN-DELTA.

KENOVA, W. VA., February 13, 1932.

Hon. H. D. HATFIELD,
Washington, D. C.:

Your telegram received regarding LaFollette-Costigan bill. Discussed with leaders here. All believe conditions here do not justify the provision providing for a resembled dole. The amendment for road construction will meet with approval. We are willing to bide by your judgment for we know you are very familiar with West Virginia conditions and needs. Thanking for the courtesy extended.

WAYNE COUNTY PRESS,
JOHN T. HEREFORD, Jr., Editor.

WILLIAMSON, W. VA., February 14, 1932.

Senator H. D. HATFIELD,
Washington, D. C.:

No need in Williamson or Mingo County of such legislation, which is wrong in principle; while there has been some distress because of unemployment, local agencies have so far provided for distressed and will continue to do so as long as there is need.

O. H. BOOTEN,
Editor Mingo Republican.

SHINNSTON, W. VA., February 14, 1932.

Senator HENRY D. HATFIELD,
Washington, D. C.:

Opposed to principle of La Follette-Costigan bill, but public sentiment, because of unemployment conditions, seems to favor some form of Federal relief.

SHINNSTON NEWS.

WELCH, W. VA., February 15, 1932.

Senator H. D. HATFIELD:

Responsible leaders do not believe conditions justify gratuitous relief from Federal Treasury and greatly oppose dole in any form. Opportunity to earn through construction or other work much preferred. Conditions are bad in some sections of coal field, but operators are taking good care of men in large majority of camps.

WELCH DAILY NEWS.

CLARKSBURG, W. VA., February 15, 1932.

United States Senator HENRY D. HATFIELD:

While there are some who feel strongly in favor of any measure intended to relieve the jobless and the needy, the preponderance of sentiment in this section appears to be against the plan of the La Follette-Costigan bill. While conditions have been bad in this section, as in other sections, local relief measures are not yet out of bounds and distress has thus far been given adequate attention through local emergency funds and measures. There is a feeling that one of the first essentials toward restored prosperity is the necessity of keeping the credit of the United States upon a firm basis, that constant depletion of the Treasury will handicap that imperative duty. I may add that there is gratification and cheer throughout the central West Virginia territory over the credit relief to be afforded by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation and over the measure now in hand to loosen Federal reserve restrictions. This credit aid to small banks, to depositors of closed banks, and to business and industry in general will be greatly beneficial. It is believed this aid should be extended to small State banks through enabling amendments. It is also believed that one of the most needful steps toward a restoration of normal business conditions is revision of the antitrust laws so as to promote beneficial cooperation, particularly with regard to basic industries, prevent ruinous competition, and yet preserve the essential antimonopoly feature of the law. This, it is felt, would do more to improve conditions than all the cash that could be doled out of the Federal Treasury.

WILLIAM L. GEPPERT,
Editor in Chief Clarksburg Telegram.

HUNTINGTON, W. VA., February 15, 1932.

Senator HENRY D. HATFIELD:

Public sentiment in West Virginia, in my judgment, is opposed to enactment of La Follette-Costigan emergency relief measure. Citizens appear unwilling at this time to accept unemployment situation as serious enough to warrant resort to principle of Federal dole for relief.

CLYDE A. WELLMAN,
Editor of the Advertiser.

ELKINS, W. VA., February 15, 1932.

Hon. H. D. HATFIELD,
United States Senate:

Sentiment here seems against dole if relief can possibly be provided otherwise, but suffering is widespread and something must be done without delay in near-by mining towns. Seven hundred and forty-six children and 40 mothers dependent on Red Cross and allied charities; many others aided. Local relief funds exhausted and new drive started. People here are giving to very limit, but outside aid appears necessary in near-by localities. Red Cross leader, Mrs. B. M. Hoover, concurs in this.

R. G. BUSH,
Elkins Intermountain.

Mr. HATFIELD. Realizing that there are other States where the condition of the people and the finances of the State and local communities may not permit the taking care of the needy, and with a firm purpose in mind to be a party to legislation which can actually be enacted into law, I have presented the amendment which I trust will meet with the approval of a majority of the Members of this body as well as a majority of the other branch of Congress and, in addition thereto, the approval of the President of the United States.

I regret exceedingly that I was not in a position to offer the amendment until this late hour in the consideration of the pending legislation. I feel that if I had done so, in all probability I would have gathered about me more support and more sympathy for the amendment, which I not only believe to be sound, but meritorious, and which I believe will go farther toward the relief of the States in their entirety and within the local units of government, which will bring more relief and that, too, through the means of money expended for labor than has been utilized in the development of projects in the States and in the counties and on the highways.

I wish to comment upon a statement taken from the hearings of the Subcommittee on Manufactures. The Hon. George W. Welsh, city manager of Grand Rapids, Mich., in his testimony before the committee, after carefully outlining the methods adopted which have adequately taken care of the unemployed situation in that city, testified that they had projects started which it would take the better part of a year to complete. These projects are taking care of the unemployment situation in that city. He testified that the city had the credit and was willing to sell bonds provided a market could be found for them.

I quote further from the testimony of Mr. Welsh:

The CHAIRMAN. Can you tell the committee what standard of work relief is given to those who are receiving this direct aid?

Mr. WELSH. In Grand Rapids we insist that every able-bodied citizen asking for relief, after having a physical examination by our own physicians as to whether he is capable of doing heavy work or light work or no work at all, is required to perform some public work and give the relief that is necessary for his family.

* * * * * * *

Mr. CHAIRMAN. How many families or heads of families are receiving aid?

Mr. WELSH. At the present time heads of 3,660 families are working for their direct relief.

The CHAIRMAN. How does that compare with a year ago?

Mr. WELSH. It is greater.

The CHAIRMAN. How much?

Mr. WELSH. I should think close to one-third. We supplement what we are doing by seeing that those in need of relief are placed on public projects where we have money available for the projects. We do not encourage projects that do not give the maximum amount of labor.

The CHAIRMAN. What type of projects have you been undertaking?

Mr. WELSH. We have used many types of projects—improvement of parks, opening of dead-end streets, grading of unimproved streets, and so forth—where the work can be done without the expenditure of moneys for materials. We have laid over 10 miles of water mains, our water department paying for the mains out of their funds and we supplying the labor.

The $435,000 item mentioned previously was for the completion of trunk sewers.

We do no projects that can not be done with the maximum of labor and the minimum of material and equipment. In other words, our equipment consists almost entirely of wheelbarrows, shovels and picks, and planks to roll the wheelbarrows on, and in doing our park work using only such equipment as the city already possesses.

We had a very interesting experiment in the past month competing with the contractors on sewer projects, competing with the engineer's estimate of the cost of the job—something over $7,000. By using no machinery we have completed the job under the estimate of the engineers and have taken care of 40 families on that job.

* * * * * * *

Senator HATFIELD. How do you raise this money—by taxation or bond issue?

Mr. WELSH. Bond issue.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there any debt limit for cities in the State of Michigan?

Mr. WELSH. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. What is the limit?

Mr. WELSH. We are well within our limit. The Michigan statute allows 10 per cent of the assessed valuation. That would allow us, in Grand Rapids, something over $26,000,000, against which we have at the present time outstanding bonds, minus our sinking fund, a little over $9,000,000.

The CHAIRMAN. How much of those issues is due to the employment-relief program?

Mr. WELSH. Well, we are allowed to issue, under special State provision, one-fourth of 1 per cent for emergency relief—one-fourth of 1 per cent of our assessed valuation. On that basis we have issued something over $700,000 worth of bonds. We have issued $435,000 for sewer construction, and have just recently passed and will be asking for $1,750,000 to continue that program.

The CHAIRMAN. Are these new sewer projects, or are you relaying some of the old sewers?

Mr. WELSH. It is largely new. It is the completion of a sanitary system started some time ago.

Senator HATFIELD. When will that be completed?

Mr. WELSH. We figure that it will take the better part of a year or more if we get the money. We have to sell the bonds.

There is the picture, Mr. President, in the progressive State of Michigan and the wonderful city of Grand Rapids, showing how that city has been taking care of all its unemployed. They have done so in a way to enable the beneficiaries to feel that the food they receive, the clothing which is supplied them, and the shoes upon their feet are earned by honest toil.

So far as the issuance of bonds is concerned, what is the predicament in which States and municipalities find themselves at the present time? It is similar to that affecting the bonds of the Federal Government. The fact that West Virginia has redeemed her bonds before their maturity in each and every succeeding year up to 1930 is an excellent recommendation as to the standing of West Virginia in the financial world, and should be appreciated by those who are interested in the purchase of good, substantial bonds.

I quote further from the testimony of Mr. Welsh:

* * * * * * *

The CHAIRMAN. By the public works program?

Mr. WELSH. No; I believe——

The CHAIRMAN. Or do you mean by making available to the city money for made-work programs?

Mr. WELSH. I would not advocate the usual type of made-work programs, where a small amount of that appropriated goes for labor and a large amount goes for material. I believe that the plan we have tried out for two years in Grand Rapids could be extended to the States and to the National Government. I would make this army of unemployed a work army. I believe that the Government could find projects enough throughout the country to take these men out of the city—Mr. Ryerson's 10,000 single men—and put them on projects using labor only. The work that every one of our men does is on work that requires no outlay for material or machinery—just work they can do with shovels, wheelbarrows, picks, and planks to run wheelbarrows on. We have kept over 3,000 men employed every day.

We have been running over two years, and I believe it would be possible for the Government to do the same thing at the minimum of cost.

* * * * * * *

I believe the Government could do the same thing and perhaps encourage the States to carry some of the load.

Mr. President, the picture thus depicted by Mr. Welsh confronts us in the State of West Virginia, and I do not believe the conditions that confront West Virginia are different from those that face the people generally of this country. I think the experience we are having in that State is not unlike the experience other sections are having. In my candid judgment, what the local governments need, what the States need, is credit and not charity.

Continuing to read from Mr. Welsh's statement:

I would like to emphasize, as Mr. Dykstra has, that it is not so much a question of what have we done but what are we going to do. Are we going to be able to sell bonds? If the balance of the President's program has the effect of solving that problem, our city is in a position to carry on. We are not over our bonded limit. It has not been a tremendous tax burden because the bonds have been issued over a period of three years. It will be a burden three years from now. If we could be assured of sufficient money to amortize them over a period of 15 years, we would be prepared to go through this for the next three or four years.

But if the purpose of your bills is to hand us money, and we have to hand it out, it would disrupt the system we have at the present time, and perhaps the advertisement of the fact the Federal Government will spend this money will increase our load.

* * * * * * *

Senator COSTIGAN. You do recognize an immediate emergency in the Nation as a whole?

Mr. WELSH. Yes.

Senator COSTIGAN. Which calls for some form of national action?

Mr. WELSH. Yes; the responsibility can not be the municipality's alone.

Senator COSTIGAN. What the committee is now considering is an emergency program for the prevention of suffering and starvation. The long-time program to which you refer, of keeping the idle employed, is not necessarily inconsistent with the first suggestion, is it?

Mr. WELSH. Except that I think it would be better to employ them and let them earn the relief for their families than to give the relief and leave them idle; in other words, every dollar that we have raised by bond issue, outside of those families where there is no able-bodied breadwinner, has gone into groceries and fuel which have been converted through labor into relief. They have been earning what they have received. I think that some such plan as that is feasible, and your money would go farther.

Mr. President, the amendment which I have proposed will, to my mind, make possible relief in the form of employment for those skilled workers who, due to the present financial condition or the attitude of investors, have been unable to secure employment.

While it does not create a dole, it does permit those States whose people are in need to avail themselves of a facility whereby they may secure the funds which they need in order to take care of those who are suffering and in distress.

On the other hand, it does not force upon any State control over its people by Federal bureaus.

I sincerely hope, Mr. President, that those who are in sympathy with my idea looking toward relief in this rational way will either support the amendment I have proposed or some other measure in keeping with the suggestion I have made.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from West Virginia to the amendment in the nature of a substitute.

Mr. KING and Mr. LEWIS suggested the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Costigan	Johnson	Robinson, Ind.
Austin	Couzens	Jones	Schall
Bailey	Cutting	Kean	Sheppard
Bankhead	Dale	Kendrick	Shipstead
Barbour	Dickinson	Keyes	Smith
Barkley	Dill	King	Smoot
Black	Fess	La Follette	Steiwer
Blaine	Fletcher	Lewis	Stephens
Borah	Frazier	Logan	Thomas, Idaho
Bratton	George	McGill	Thomas, Okla.
Brookhart	Glass	McKellar	Townsend
Broussard	Goldsborough	McNary	Trammell
Bulkley	Gore	Neely	Tydings
Bulow	Hale	Norbeck	Vandenberg
Byrnes	Harrison	Norris	Wagner
Capper	Hastings	Nye	Walcott
Caraway	Hatfield	Oddie	Walsh, Mass.
Carey	Hawes	Patterson	Walsh, Mont.
Connally	Hayden	Pittman	Watson
Coolidge	Hebert	Reed	Wheeler
Copeland	Hull	Robinson, Ark.	White

The VICE PRESIDENT. Eighty-four Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from West Virginia to the amendment in the nature of a substitute.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator will state it.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Is the amendment of the Senator from West Virginia offered to the so-called substitute, or is it proposed to the original bill?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair is informed that it is proposed to the substitute.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I merely desire to point out to the Chair that the substitute itself begins:

Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert in lieu thereof the following.

And that the amendment of the Senator from West Virginia proposes to—

Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert in lieu thereof the following.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It should be, "In lieu of the language proposed to be inserted by the Senator from Alabama," and so forth.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Yes; the Senator from West Virginia could make his motion in that way. He could present his amendment in such a way that it would be admissible; but I am just pointing out the fact that with one substitute pending, another substitute in the form that it is offered to the original bill is given priority by the action of the Chair.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair had not read the amendment, but was advised that it was proposed to strike out——

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. The amendment proposed by the Senator from West Virginia in the form in which it is presented is actually an amendment to the original bill. The language is this:

Amendment (in the nature of a substitute) intended to be proposed by Mr. HATFIELD to the bill (S. 3045) to provide for cooperation—

And so forth.

And the language of the amendment is:

Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert in lieu thereof the following.

The point I am making is that with one substitute for the original bill pending it is now proposed to consider and dispose of another substitute for the original bill. The amendment, of course, could be easily made to conform to the requirements of parliamentary practice. If the Senator from West Virginia desires to have it considered as an amendment to the substitute, he should propose to strike out something in the substitute and employ the language in his amendment in place of it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Arkansas is correct; but the Chair was under the impression that that motion was made when the amendment was offered from the floor.

Mr. HATFIELD. Mr. President, it was the intention of the Senator from West Virginia to offer an amendment to the original bill.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. That is the way I understood it, and that is the condition that the amendment is in.

Mr. HATFIELD. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Yes.

Mr. HATFIELD. I tried to make that point at the time I offered the amendment.

Mr. ROBINSON or Arkansas. I make the point of order that with a substitute for the original bill pending it is not in order to consider and dispose of another substitute for the original bill prior to the disposition of the first substitute.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair sustains the point of order. Unless the Senator from West Virginia changes his amendment, the point of order is sustained.

Mr. HATFIELD. Mr. President, I made the suggestion originally that my amendment had to deal with the original bill, but the Chair ruled the other way.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator is mistaken about that. The Chair clearly understood that the Senator stated that his amendment was offered as a substitute for the Black amendment.

Mr. HATFIELD. Mr. President, may I make a statement?

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. There is nothing before the Senate. The Chair has sustained the point of order made by the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. The question now is on the substitute?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question now is on the Black amendment in the nature of a substitute.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. HATFIELD] made his position very clear, in my opinion. The Chair held—and I was wondering if the Chair will still hold—that we must vote on all these substitutes and all these proposed amendments prior to the disposition by vote of the Black amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. That is the attitude of the Chair. That is provided for in Rule XVIII.

Mr. McNARY. Then this does not in any way involve other substitutes that are before the Senate or that may be presented.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It would if it were agreed to. If not agreed to, then it would not. The Senator from West Virginia could offer his amendment as a substitute for the Black amendment if he desired.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, I think there was a misunderstanding a moment ago. The amendment offered by the Senator from West Virginia, which he called a substitute, would have applied to the main bill; but the other day we decided that we must perfect the main bill before we voted on the substitute. I think the Senator from West Virginia should have offered his amendment to the main bill and had that voted on first. The fact that it was offered to the substitute I think was an error, and I agree with the Senator from Arkansas and the ruling of the Chair.

Mr. HATFIELD. Mr. President, I came over here before the Senate convened this morning, bringing my amendment, feeling that I had an amendment that would apply to the original bill; and I was advised that I should have to offer it as a substitute for the Black amendment. Then I made the point when I rose from my seat here, and again it was ruled that I should offer the amendment to the Black amendment. I could do nothing other than follow the dictum laid down by the Chair.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator offer his amendment as a substitute?

Mr. HATFIELD. I should like to offer the amendment when it is in order.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It is in order now.

Mr. HATFIELD. Then I offer it as a substitute, Mr. President.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from West Virginia in the nature of a substitute for the Black amendment.

The amendment, in the nature of a substitute, was rejected.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question now is upon the so-called Black substitute. Upon that question the yeas and nays have been ordered.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, the Senate is now called upon to make a choice between the original bill and the substitute bill sponsored by the Senator from Alabama [Mr. BLACK], the Senator from Ohio [Mr. BULKLEY], and myself.

The original bill has been modified by the amendment offered by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] so that both bills provide for an appropriation of $375,000,000 for road construction. In that respect they are identical. They likewise provide for an appropriation of $375,000,000 to be turned over to the States for relief work. They differ in this respect: In the original bill the amount is to be turned over to the States without any return at all to the Federal Government; and secondly, the administration of the relief is primarily in the hands of a board or bureau whose offices will be here in the city of Washington. The substitute provides for a loan of the amounts advanced to the States, to be returned by the States; and if not returned by the States, to be deducted from the amounts which shall hereafter be allocated to the States for road construction. So that the difference between the two bills is as between a loan and a gift to the States, as between administration in Washington and administration in the various States by their own organizations.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Let us have the yeas and nays, Mr. President.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The yeas and nays have been ordered. The question is on the so-called Black substitute. The clerk will call the roll.

The Chief Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BARKLEY (when his name was called). On this question I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Colorado [Mr. WATERMAN], who is absent. I am informed that if present he would vote "nay." If I were at liberty to vote, I should vote "yea."

Mr. BULOW (when his name was called). I have a pair with the senior Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. MOSES], who is absent. If he were present, he would vote "nay," and if I were at liberty to vote I should vote "yea." I withhold my vote.

Mr. JONES (when his name was called). I have a pair with the senior Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON], who is necessarily absent. I find I can transfer that pair, however, to the junior Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HOWELL], and I do so. I vote "nay."

Mr. KING (when his name was called). Upon this vote I have a pair with the senior Senator from North Carolina [Mr. MORRISON], who, if present, would vote "nay." I withhold my vote.

Mr. LOGAN (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. DAVIS], who is absent. I therefore withhold my vote.

Mr. FESS (when Mr. MOSES's name was called). The senior Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. MOSES] is unavoidably detained from the Senate. If present and not paired, he would vote "nay."

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma (when his name was called). On this question I have a pair with the senior Senator from Illinois [Mr. GLENN]. I understand that if he were present he would vote as I expect to vote, and therefore I desire to vote. I vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. GLASS. I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BINGHAM], and in his absence I withhold my vote.

I also desire to announce that my colleague the senior Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON] is necessarily absent attending the disarmament conference at Geneva.

The junior Senator from Louisiana [Mr. LONG] is also necessarily absent, detained by business in his State.

Mr. GEORGE. My colleague the senior Senator from Georgia [Mr. HARRIS] is absent on account of illness. He has a pair. If he were present and permitted to vote, he would vote "yea."

Mr. FESS. I desire to announce that the senior Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. METCALF] is paired with the senior Senator from Georgia [Mr. HARRIS]. If the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. METCALF] were present, he would vote "nay," and I am informed that if the senior Senator from Georgia were present he would vote "yea."

I also desire to announce that the junior Senator from California [Mr. SHORTRIDGE] is paired with the junior Senator from Louisiana [Mr. LONG]. If the Senator from California [Mr. SHORTRIDGE] were present, he would vote "nay," and I am informed that if the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. LONG] were present he would vote "yea."

So Mr. BLACK's amendment in the nature of a substitute as amended was rejected.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, I ask that the substitute just voted on may be printed as it was perfected by amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered. The bill is open to amendment.

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. President, I offer an amendment to Title II affecting the text, the same matter as to which the substitute was perfected.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will state the amendment.

The CHIEF CLERK. In the reprint, on page 13, line 23, the Senator from Arizona proposes to strike out the words "and except that such amounts may be expended upon highways, streets, or bridges within the limits of municipalities without regard to the limitations contained in the Federal highway act, as amended, upon construction within municipalities" and to insert in lieu thereof "but the same may be used to meet the provisions of such act as to State funds required on Federal-aid projects, and except that in the expenditure of such sum the limitations contained in the Federal highway act, as amended, upon construction within municipalities of 2,500 or more population and upon the payments per mile which may be made from Federal funds shall not apply."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair is advised that this amendment is offered to a provision of the bill which has already been amended, and before the amendment of the Senator from Arizona would be in order the vote by which the other amendment was agreed to should be reconsidered.

Mr. HAYDEN. I do not quite understand that. The bill was amended by adding certain language to Title II. Certainly that can be perfected.

The VICE PRESIDENT. This amendment is a part of the Norris amendment, which was agreed to.

Mr. HAYDEN. I am trying to perfect the Norris amendment. It seems to me it is entirely in order to do so.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It can be done by reconsidering the vote by which the Norris amendment was agreed to. Is there objection to a reconsideration?

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I object to a reconsideration; but I would not object to a request for unanimous consent to consider the amendment of the Senator from Arizona.

Mr. HAYDEN. I ask unanimous consent that the amendment may be considered.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the junior Senator from Arizona [Mr. HAYDEN].

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, will not the Senator from Arizona explain his amendment?

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. President, I explained the amendment when it was offered as an amendment to the proposed substitute. The effect is to make clear and certain that we are making all the changes in the law necessary in order that money may be expended within municipalities. As the text now reads we take off the limitation as to the population, but do not take off the limitation as to the cost per mile; and my amendment would change the text in both those respects.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

On a division the amendment was rejected.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I desire to offer an amendment which may be out of order under the ruling of the Chair a moment ago. The amendment is to come on page 12, line 3. I desire to move to strike out the words "money or." The Senate expressed itself as to the amendment a few minutes ago. I desire to perfect the original bill by offering the same amendment now. If necessary, I will ask unanimous consent that the amendment may be considered.

The VICE PRESIDENT. That amendment would be in order. The amendment offered by the Senator from Arizona was an amendment to an amendment which had been agreed to.

Mr. GORE. I offer the amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will state the amendment.

The CHIEF CLERK. In the reprint, on page 12, line 3, the Senator from Oklahoma proposes to strike out the words "money or," so that it will read:

SEC. 12. The term "emergency relief," when used in this title with respect to State expenditures, means relief in the form of commodities furnished by the State or its civil subdivisions or by private contributions from within the State—

And so forth.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, the Senate expressed itself on a similar amendment a few minutes ago, and I think this is in accord with the judgment and experience of social and welfare workers generally.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, it is not the intention of the authors of this bill, nor is it contemplated that under the bill, if it should become a law, any money would be paid out directly in the form of a so-called dole. However, as many Senators know, there is a grave situation growing up so far as rents are concerned. In many of the communities relief has been so meager that it has been utterly impossible for the private or public relief agencies to pay any rents, except to stay eviction in a few cases. The result has been that in community after community the landlords themselves, receiving no income from rents from unemployed families, are drawing upon relief in their own right or in their own interest.

It was contemplated that under this section of the bill Federal cooperation would be permitted in meeting some of the burdens of unemployment relief other than the furnishing of commodities.

Another instance is the case of the payment of gas and electric bills. Where a relief agency is endeavoring to maintain a family and to hold them together it is perfectly absurd that the family should be given groceries and not have any gas or other fuel with which to cook them. They would have to eat them raw.

The only purpose of this phraseology in this section of the bill is to enable the State and local agencies which receive assistance from the Federal Government to pay out money for necessary fuel, light, and rent in those cases where it is absolutely essential in order to maintain the family and to keep it together.

I hope the amendment will be rejected.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. WAGNER. Mr. President, in view of the fact that the Black amendment was amended in the course of the day to conform practically to the substitute which I had intended to offer, I shall not offer the substitute.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, the amendment I have tendered takes the form of a substitute to the bill. I am informed by gentlemen that there are provisions in the act heretofore passed, known as the finance credit act, which cover the feature of the amendment. So I beg to withdraw it for the present.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment is withdrawn.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President, on page 3 of the print of the bill now being used at the desk, in line 12, I desire to strike out the period after the word "it" and to insert the following: "and also a report giving the names of the employees engaged in administering the relief herein provided, the character of service performed by each, and the salary paid each."

This is an amendment similar to the one I proposed to the substitute which we were considering a few moments ago.

My idea is to have publicity given to the salaries paid these additional employees and the number employed. I think it is tragic, but it sometimes occurs, that in administering even relief funds a substantial part of the funds available is used to set up practically a "pie counter" for the purpose of giving a lot of people positions who are pets and favorites of those administering the funds.

This amendment will not check it entirely; but if we give publicity to those who are the beneficiaries of the fund in the way of salaries that are paid to them and also have an explanation as to the character of service they are rendering, I believe it will at least have a deterrent effect and will get a greater part of the funds into the hands of the needy and the helpless whom we are trying to assist. I hope the Senator will agree to the adoption of my amendment.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. If the language of the Senator's amendment confines it to any employee of the Federal administration of the act, I shall be very glad to accept it; but I would like to have him repeat it, because under the set-up contemplated by the bill the administration and distribution of relief will be carried on by States and local agencies over which the Federal agency will not have sufficient control to get the information to furnish a report as to the activities which are going on in the various localities. Will the Senator please repeat the language of his amendment so I can make certain that it applies only to the employees who might be engaged by the board or the administerial officers?

Mr. TRAMMELL. On page 3 of the print being used at the desk, in line 15, after the word "it," strike out the period and insert:

And also a report giving the names of the employees engaged in administering the relief herein provided, the character of service performed by each, and the salary paid each.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I think, the way the language reads, it would require the board to submit monthly a list of all employees of the relief agencies, both public and private, in every community which is receiving any assistance. I will say frankly to the Senator that I would welcome his amendment if he would confine it to the Federal bureau and the board, because I think his amendment is very sound in that respect. But under the set-up contemplated by the bill, the moment the general plan submitted by a State for the distribution of funds is approved, those funds will pass into the hands of the States and local authorities and the Federal board will no longer have any knowledge of the employees who are administering them or of the services they are performing. If the Senator would insert the word "its," so as to require the reporting of the names of "its employees," then I think it would take care of the matter; that is, it would apply to the employees of the board and of the administrative officers.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Of course, I appreciate the situation in regard to this being a monthly report. As far as the question of the application of the amendment is concerned, I think it would be decidedly better if it applied also to the State employees and the people operating in the States.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. That might be true; but under the set-up contemplated by the bill there is such a minimum of Federal supervision involved that when, for instance, the set-up in the State of Florida proposed by the State is approved and the money apportioned, the Federal board will not know the names of any of the public or private relief forces in that State. It would be impossible, without a tremendous amount of red tape, for them to make such a report. I would be very glad if the Senator would confine it to the Federal bureau, because they, in my judgment, will have very few employees engaged in the work once the set-ups are approved. The amendment will be worth while then, I think.

Mr. TRAMMELL. I think I can meet the objection by striking out the word "the" and inserting the word "its," so it will read:

And also a report giving the names of its employees engaged in administering the relief herein provided and the character of the services performed by each and the salary paid to each.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I have no objection.

Mr. TRAMMELL. I will accept the suggestion; but so far as the expenditure of the money is concerned, the Federal Government and the American taxpayers are making this contribution. It is going into the hands of the States to be administered and I believe there should be some report of the distribution of the money. I know of no better information to obtain than information concerning the people who are drawing salaries in administering it. In the States throughout the Union a very large majority of the officers and those who may be administering the fund will be honest and conscientious and economical under the circumstances, but there will be some who will be found to be otherwise. I have seen public funds wasted in almost every State in the Union by people who have had a lot of money turned over to them for some public purpose without any restrictions or any limitations. Some employees will not be deterred by the sacredness of the trust.

I know in certain localities in the country following great disasters, when a nation-wide appeal was made for assistance to help those in distress, to help those who were in need of food and raiment, and when the American people generously sent in their funds for that purpose, some of those administering the fund lived lavishly and luxuriously at public expense and limited the poor person that needed assistance to $1.50 or $2 a week.

They spent a great deal of time and money unnecessarily running around in Packard or Cadillac automobiles, stopping at the finest hotels in the city, and building up enormous expense accounts against the funds contributed by the generous-hearted people of the country which they were instructed to expend for the relief of a stricken people. There will be some of that done in connection with this fund unless we put some restriction upon it in the way I have suggested. I know in the main agents disbursing such relief funds are not guilty of such diversion and waste of funds, but there are some, and it is to somewhat check them that I have made this proposal.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I merely wish to point out to the Senator from Florida that this bill is under attack on the one hand from those who contend that there is altogether too much Federal authority vested in the relief board and that it means, according to the misinterpretation, as I conceive it, that they put upon the language, the establishment of a great bureaucracy here which will stand in the way of getting this money into the communities where it is needed.

On the other hand, the bill is under attack from those who believe we have not provided for sufficient supervisory power and control on the part of the Federal Government. I wish frankly to say to the Senator from Florida that if the authors of the bill have erred they have erred on the side of not providing a sufficient amount of Federal control over the administration of these funds. I hope the Senator will remember that we are in an emergency and if we grant the necessity for action we must take the risk that goes with local and State administration and the speed with which it may be gotten into operation.

Under the terms of the bill as it stands, once a general plan submitted by a State for the distribution of funds has been approved, the funds will immediately pass into the hands of the State and local public and private agencies, where they may be distributed; and the board itself will not be aware, as I said before, of the personnel of the administration provided by the State and the local communities. Therefore, while I think the suggestion made by the Senator might be an excellent one if we were setting up an organization to provide this relief directly from a Federal bureau, yet in view of the fact that we are not, in view of the fact that great administrative discretion is left with the States and the localities, then it is impractical for the Federal bureau to furnish information concerning the personnel employed by the local communities and by the State governments. Therefore I suggested to the Senator that he confine it to employees of the Federal board.

Mr. TRAMMELL. I appreciate the urgency of the situation, I hope, just as much as my good friend from Wisconsin. We might have a little different manner and way of approaching the subject of relief. This is not a matter of giving control by the national board over the State authorities, but it is merely a matter of information to be transmitted to the board and then transmitted to the Congress. It is for the information of Congress, that we may know how the local authorities in the States are administering this charity which has been extended on the part of the Congress as representatives of the taxpayers, the American people, to assist in their relief.

So far as the question of time is concerned, it will not take a great deal of time. I had a little experience once some years ago when I saw a policy similar to this requiring reports as to employees under a special fund. It was contended it would take too much time and too much money and that it could not possibly be furnished. The fight was made along that line, but we succeeded in passing the legislation with such a provision in it, and a great many people were of the impression that it resulted in saving considerable money to the State. I want to save all of this money I can for those who are in need of food, in need of raiment, in need of shelter. I do not want a lot of it probably wasted by people who merely desire to put themselves or their friends into soft snaps in the way of jobs.

So far as the question of the centralization of power in the administration of a national board over State authorities is concerned, I favor the State authorities every time. Yet there should be some restriction thrown around them in a case like this. Almost every day we have illustrations here in Washington of, we might say, absolutely reckless disregard of the interests of the States as manifested through the bureaucracies here.

We also have had illustrations of an utter lack of knowledge of local situations. I have just been reading to-day the regulations promulgated by the Department of Agriculture in connection with the $50,000,000 fund provided for loans to farms.

When I read them, knowing a little about conditions in my own State, I was impressed that the people here in the Department of Agriculture know nothing about Florida and conditions in Florida. They provide for a loan of not exceeding $25 an acre to a truck farmer for his fertilizer, seed, and everything he needs to make a crop. At a conference, attended by other Senators and myself, with the Secretary of Agriculture I informed him that was inadequate, and yet the department insists upon that ridiculously small sum. Anybody that knows anything about vegetable farming and truck farming in a State where fertilizer is used will know that such a sum is absolutely inadequate for most of the crops produced. A loan of that amount will be of little or no service to the farmers of my State.

This is just an illustration of the working of a bureau in Washington. We see instances of this kind almost every day, exhibiting evidence of a lack of knowledge and lack of appreciation of the situation back in the States.

I favor a "back to the States" administration of every possible kind, but I think if we have a little light from the State agencies as to how much of this public fund they are spending for salaries it will probably be a slight warning to anyone who may be tempted to be luxurious in the payment of salaries. There will be a lot of pets and hangers-on, people loafing around the States always looking for a little public "pap," who will want to get on the pay roll in connection with this fund. I know that most of those back in the States intrusted with this sacred obligation will be true to the trust, but not all of them will be so trustworthy and honest.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Florida yield to the Senator from Alabama?

Mr. TRAMMELL. I yield.

Mr. BLACK. I invite the attention of the Senator to section 11 because the statement is made that the board approves the set-up of the State; that ends it. As a matter of fact, the State has to work under rules and regulations prescribed by the bureau in Washington under the terms of the bill. Not only that but they have to make a report, including a report of all expenditures.

May I call the Senator's attention to these words:

Each State agency cooperating with the board under the provisions of this act shall make such reports concerning its operations and expenditures as shall be prescribed or requested by the board. The board may revoke any existing certificate—

The certificate is what the State gets its money under—

The board may revoke any existing certificate or withhold any further certificate—

Which means money—

provided for in section 9 whenever it shall determine as to any State, that the State agency has not properly expended or supervised the expenditure of moneys paid to it in accordance with the plans approved under this title.

So, instead of it not requiring a report to be made by the State, it still requires the State to work under rules and regulations prescribed by this Washington board, which knows as little about the situation in the State as the Agricultural Department knows of fertilizer necessities in Florida.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President, I move the adoption of the amendment as it has been offered.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Florida. [Putting the question.] The Chair is in doubt.

On a division the amendment was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill is before the Senate, and open to amendment.

EXECUTIVE MESSAGES REFERRED

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate several messages from the President of the United States, submitting and withdrawing certain nominations, which were referred to the appropriate committees.

(For nominations this day received, see the end of Senate proceedings.)

REPORT OF THE DIRECTOR GENERAL OF RAILROADS

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States, which was read and referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce:

To the Congress of the United States:

I transmit herewith for the information of the Congress the report of the Director General of Railroads for the calendar year 1931.

HERBERT HOOVER.

THE WHITE HOUSE, February 15, 1932.

[NOTE.—Report accompanied similar message to the House of Representatives.]

RELIEF OF UNEMPLOYMENT

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 3045) to provide for cooperation by the Federal Government with the several States in relieving the hardship and suffering caused by unemployment, and for other purposes.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, may I inquire, does the Senator from Oregon desire to proceed farther to-night? The Senator from Michigan [Mr. COUZENS] has a substitute which he desires to offer and debate, and before the final vote comes I should like to have the indulgence of the Senate. I doubt if we could finish within the next hour or two, and a number of Senators have indicated that they are not able to remain here this evening.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, the choice of remaining or departing always abides, of course, with the majority of the body. On Friday when I asked for a unanimous-consent agreement to vote on the bill not later than 7 o'clock to-night and that was denied, while in no way disappointed, I did say that I hoped the Senate would remain in session to-day until we reached a final vote on the bill. Inasmuch as it is only a little after 5 o'clock, I think perhaps we could conclude the discussion and reach a final vote by 6 o'clock or thereabouts. In view of the position which I took on Friday as to a vote to-day, and the fact that all Senators had notification that they should be present and remain here until the bill was completed, I do not feel, in the absence of any expression of Senators, that I should voluntarily ask at this time for a recess.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill is before the Senate and open to amendment.

RECESS

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I move that the Senate take a recess until 12 o'clock to-morrow.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Wisconsin.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 24 minutes p. m.) the Senate took a recess until to-morrow, Tuesday, February 16, 1932, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

MONDAY, FEBRUARY 15, 1932

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

We come to Thee, our Heavenly Father, in the name of Him who first felt for the struggling, toiling, laboring man, and who first taught human brotherhood. We thank Thee for Him who first said that life is more than meat and declared that it is love, beauty, and sonship with God. Oh, it is not what the hand grasps, but what the eye sees and what the heart feels that makes life great. Do Thou turn all of us into a God-centered life. We look with reverence and adoration to the illuminated cross blazing in the skies. But, merciful Father, forgive us if we fail to be aroused by the millions of crosses around which the breath of the suffering sigh and moan. Lift men up from their barbarisms, their superstitions, and their cruelties. O Lamb of God, who for the love of man stooped to a cross, dig Thou an everlasting grave for war and hate, and let the daylight come for which the world so long has waited. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of Saturday was read and approved.

TAXATION

Mr. PATTERSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes.

The SPEAKER. Before the Chair puts the request, may the Chair state that this is unanimous-consent day? The Chair will put this request but will not recognize other gentlemen for the purpose of discussing other matters before the House to-day.

Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Alabama?

There was no objection.

Mr. PATTERSON. Mr. Speaker, a day or two ago we had a most interesting and a most pointed address by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. CRISP] with reference to the tax situation. I rise at this time not to take issue with that address but to present another side of the question.

I feel that at a time like this—although we realize the serious condition of the Treasury, but yet the country is in a serious condition—it would be most unfortunate to try to tax ourselves out of the depression. I feel that we have now the machinery with which to raise taxes, and with some material amendments in higher brackets on income taxes and estate taxes, with corresponding gift taxes and such like—if we would return this country to prosperity—our tax system will then be such as to bring in the necessary revenue. If we try to tax everybody and to tax everything in this great country of ours now, in my judgment, we will see that it will react against the very thing we hope to accomplish to benefit the people, and for one I want to express myself now as opposed at a time like this to trying to levy a tax on every person in America and to try to broaden out the tax system to dig deeper and deeper into the pockets of the masses of the people in our country at a serious time like this. By doing this we would not only handicap ourselves in returning to prosperity, but we would bring about a system where the common masses of the people would be paying a larger and larger bulk of the taxes, which in my judgment is undesirable and would have serious consequences. With this the great productive sources of wealth of the country where the burden of taxation should be placed will be escaping more and more taxation.

For one I want to express myself in no uncertain terms as being opposed to broadening the national tax system to reach more and more the entire American people and increasing their burdens of taxation at this time in order to try to clear up the deficit or pay the national debt. In my judgment we have been brought to this sad plight by evils which should be remedied, and this does not require the poor people of our country being heavier burdened by taxation, on the contrary, what we need is relief for the masses.

I want to point out to those of you who have thought over this question that we can not tax the American people to-day and clear up the deficit and then pay the great debt that we owe under present conditions. There are other questions where we should strike for relief. We owe more to-day and it will take more purchasing power to pay the American debt than it would in 1920 when the war closed. It will take more of the commodities of our people to pay this debt and it can not be done under present conditions.

What we need now is to bring the country back to prosperity and give us a stabilized currency at a point where there will be more money in circulation, and then the working out of a proper system will be easy, but as long as conditions are like they are now, I think it is a fearful thing to talk about raising all the revenue we might need at this time out of our people, with conditions like they are now. Broaden out the base of taxation in order to further reach every man, woman, and child in this country. I want to express myself as being opposed to this.

If we are to credit press reports of the condition of the Treasury, as the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. CRISP] says, we have a serious problem to face, but I respectfully dissent from the opinion of anyone who seeks to further burden the great masses of our people who are now overburdened by tax. It can not be defended; we should relieve the farmer, laboring man, the small business man of taxes rather than loading him with more. And for me I propose to stand by this principle.

Any effort to put a burden of taxes on the necessities of our people at this time, or any of these necessities, should be resisted to the limit, and I for myself will resist them to the last. A good deal of our present tax system is inequable; take, for instance, the income tax now, there is no raise in the per cent after it crosses the $500,000 mark. A man with this amount pays the same per cent as one who has a net income of twenty millions or more. This should be remedied, but the iniquitous schemes suggested by the Treasury Department, in my opinion, will ruin this country, and I hope that Members of this House will serve notice that no such system will be upheld here. And, my colleagues, we can not escape the responsibility, for we are the revenue-raising body, and the country will give this House credit or blame according as we act in this important matter. And I as a humble Member warn Members of my own party of the danger we face in this crisis. I repeat we can not tax ourselves out of the depression.

What we should do is to pass a bill which will raise the taxes on the higher incomes and estates and a corresponding gift tax with teeth in it and probably a few other taxes which do not lay any further burden on the masses of our people, but which will even help protect them. They can be found by getting after the international bankers, Wall Street speculators and manipulators, as well as these foreign concessionaries in our own country who have gone out into other countries and by nefarious schemes bringing us more and more diplomatic trouble and helping to make it harder and harder for some of our own legitimate industries.

Then, again, there is another group of taxes which we should resist, and that is a tax on certain commodities in general use, which should be left to the States only for taxation and not take up the entire field.

I note some of these taxes would lay tremendous burdens on some of our industries and homes, including everything from farm home to a manufacturing plant.

Now, Mr. Speaker, in closing I wish to say that the farmer, the working man, the professional man who tries to own a home, and the small business man of every class, especially those who have an independent business, are burdened very near to death with tax now, and I pledge myself to fight an extension of this burden. Upon this rock nearly all of the countries of past history have fallen to decay, and in keeping with my philosophy of love of home and country, reaching from every fireside in this land to this Capitol—North, South, East, and West—I shall oppose what I believe to be an abuse of this power, and sincerely hope enough of my colleagues will join me in preserving this glorious heritage and thereby hasten the return of prosperity to all the people. [Applause.]

EAST IS EAST AND WEST IS WEST

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by publishing an article written by the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. HOWARD] in commendation of my colleague, the gentleman from Texas [Mr. JONES].

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. Speaker, under the unanimous consent granted me for that purpose I am submitting for printing in the RECORD an editorial written by Hon. EDGAR HOWARD, a Member of the Congress, and appearing in the Columbus (Nebr.) Telegram of February 3:

EAST IS EAST AND WEST IS WEST

By EDGAR HOWARD in the Columbus (Nebr.) Telegram

Some years ago a famous English author, who lived many years in India and comprehended the basic difference in the manner of thought of his own people and those of India, called attention to this difference in a poem in which he said:

"For east is east and west is west,
And never the twain shall meet."

A few days ago as I listened to a colloquy on the floor of the House I recalled those lines, and it occurred to me that here in our own country we have two schools of thought as far apart as those of which Kipling wrote.

One school of thought, national in scope and predominant throughout the vast expanse of our country to the west and south of the Alleghenies, believes that our Government should serve all sections of our country and all classes of its citizens equally and without distinction.

Another school of thought, sectional in its nature and predominant in the East, believes that it is entirely proper for our Government to bestow special favors upon the great financial and industrial interests; that Government aid should be reserved to these mighty corporations and aggregations of capital; and that the most that should be accorded the struggling farmers and other distressed individuals is a little "sympathy."

Hon. MARVIN JONES, a progressive Democrat from the great agricultural State of Texas, is chairman of the Committee on Agriculture. He is an able and courageous leader in the fight to sustain agriculture and free it from the discrimination to which it has been subject at the hands of the mighty financial and industrial interests, acting through the Federal Government, which they have so long controlled.

Hon. ROBERT LUCE, a regular Republican from the great industrial State of Massachusetts, where mighty financial interests are entrenched, is one of the most erudite Members of the Congress. He has long been recognized as an important cog in the Republican organization in the House. No Member of that body has more ably and consistently represented the interests of his own people than Mr. LUCE has represented those of the great financial and industrial groups. He more brilliantly champions those mighty interests than any other man in the Congress.

The colloquy to which I refer occurred during the discussion of the appropriation bill for the Department of Agriculture with reference to certain items concerning Government loans to farmers who are in distress.

Mr. LUCE speaks the thought predominant in the industrial and financial circles of the East. Mr. JONES voices the broader thought prevailing in the West.

The following colloquy appears on pages 2758 and 2759 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of January 26, 1932:

"Mr. LUCE. Mr. Chairman, I had the curiosity to check up on the appropriations referred to in this paragraph. I have watched with some apprehension the growth of such dispensing of the benevolence of the Federal Government to help regions and classes.

"I hope there is no man in this House who excels me in sympathy for affliction. I do not question the mercy of these provisions. I am glad if they have helped.

"Let me point out the dangers here involved. We have just authorized an appropriation of $25,000,000 for seed loans without any inquiry whatever, as far as has come to my notice, either as to the extent of the need or the reasons for making the loans. An appeal to our sympathies on the general proposition that men are suffering tempts us to rash action.

"I am told that a startlingly small proportion of the loans made last spring have been collected, and I observe that this paragraph contemplates the expenditure of $500,000 simply to collect unpaid balances. Surely this is a burden on the Treasury that ought to be considered. I would suggest to the Committee on Appropriations and the Committee on Agriculture that one of them might usefully ascertain how large a percentage of the loans of 1930 and 1931 has been repaid and what is the likelihood of their repayment and that of the new loan's present circumstances. Possibly they would find that our growing practice of lending money to some one class in some one region is becoming an encouragement to debt which, after all, is the worst thing that can come to an individual or to a class of individuals. Furthermore, if the habit of letting individuals borrow from the Public Treasury is to grow, at least we ought to consider whether the borrowing should be from the Federal or from the State treasury.

"Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I was interested in the statements made by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LUCE] a moment ago. I, too, doubted the wisdom of the program which the gentleman was discussing, at the time of its inception. I think I made the only speech that was made on the floor of the House in opposition to the beginning of that program; but the program has been established as a policy of the Government. It was brought by a species of economic favoritism in tariffs, freight rates, and financial control that had bled the agricultural section white and destroyed the purchasing power of the farmer.

"Regardless of what the merits of that program may be, I confess I am unable to differentiate between making small loans of two or three hundred dollars to the farmers and the policy that was established in the $500,000,000 corporation that was voted through the other day to make loans to insurance companies, bankers, railroads, and other financial institutions.

"If it is unwise for the Federal Government to make loans to the great farming group with a few million dollars as the total, how does it become wise to appropriate $500,000,000, with a possible expansion to $2,000,000,000, to take care of certain other great groups?

"Mr. LUCE. May I answer the gentleman?

"Mr. JONES. I shall be glad to yield to the gentleman.

"Mr. LUCE. The gentleman will recall that some of us fought every attempt to fasten on that bill loans to individuals. We did not believe it was wise and tried to stop it.

"Mr. JONES. Then the gentleman thinks a corporation is superior to the individual? The corporation is an artificial person; the individual is a natural person. On what basis does the gentleman justify a Federal loan to a corporation, an artificial person, and say that is wise and a sound policy, and that a loan by the same government out of the same till to an individual, a legal, natural person, can not be justified?

"Mr. LUCE. Mr. Chairman, I justify that by saying that all these loans were to be made upon the basis of adequate security.

"Mr. JONES. Well, I want to state to the chairman that every one of these agricultural loan bills that has been presented has required a first lien on the gross production of the farmer throughout the whole crop year, and the gentleman did not put into this $500,000,000 bill that the gross production of the insurance company, of the railway company, and of other financial institutions should be mortgaged and a first lien given on those things.

"Mr. LUCE. Mr. Chairman, we were not so unwise as to require that.

"Mr. JONES. Of course, it is the gentleman's philosophy, then, that it is wise when the Government provides loans to certain groups, but it is unwise when it makes loans to other groups. The gentleman says he is willing to extend his sympathy to the great group that is engaged in farming. Many times they have been the victim of financial and governmental policies that have discriminated against them. The gentleman can bottle up his sympathy and keep it. It is not sympathy they want or need. A man can not live on sympathy alone. When a governmental policy is established, I want the farmer to have the same rights that are accorded to industry. That is American, and that is fair.

"Mr. LUCE. If the gentleman will now permit me to finish the statement, the security that is required from these institutions is such that the Nation is guaranteed a return of its money.

"Mr. JONES. Is it?

"Mr. LUCE. Let me ask the gentleman one question—

"Mr. JONES. Right on that point let us take one point at a time. As I understand, under the terms of that bill, if any of these bonds and debentures are unpaid, the Government must appropriate the money to pay such bonds and debentures. If I read the terms of the bill aright, the Government subscribes the original capital and underwrites the bonds. No one knows whether there will be a loss, nor how much; but Uncle Sam foots the bill.

"Mr. LUCE. Now, on the question of security, Mr. Chairman, am I right in my understanding that not one-third of the loans made last spring have yet been repaid?

"Mr. JONES. I do not know what that amounts to with respect to the loans made last spring. Collection on them has not been completed and times are abnormal. But with respect to the previous loans an average of above 80 per cent has been paid, and on the loans of two years ago 92 per cent has been paid.

"I want to make a plea for the tiller of the soil who lives in the far stretches of this country and who has trusted you and me to see that he is protected in his rights. He feeds the people and produces the basis of our wealth.

"He does not ask for favoritism. He asks only for a square deal. He only asks for an even chance in the race of life. He asks to be relieved of the discriminating burdens that have weighed him down. He asks to be relieved of the chains that selfish groups have forged about him. He asks for equal treatment as an American citizen in any program that is laid out by the Nation.

"That much he has a right to demand."

My chief object in presenting the foregoing views of the brilliant LUCE, recognized spokesman for the great financiers of New England and the East generally, and the views of the splendid Texan, MARVIN JONES, who for long years has so loyally pleaded in the Congress the cause of agriculture, is to give my Nebraska people a true picture of the cause of the East as championed by LUCE and the cause of the agricultural West and Middle West as championed by MARVIN JONES. I have not presented these divergent views in a partisan way. Indeed, there are a few Republicans in the Congress who repudiate the demand of the East for superior advantages at the hand of the Federal Government. And it is sadly true that in the Congress are a few Democrats who listen for and quickly obey the voice of Wall Street. In the approaching presidential campaign, and particularly in the Middle West agricultural States, the people of the farm States, Democrats and Republicans alike, should demand from presidential and congressional nominees a frank and fair statement as to whether they would, if elected, adhere to the cause of the East, as presented by Massachusetts LUCE, or to the cause of the farm States, as presented by Texas JONES.

ORDER OF BUSINESS

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to make a statement for the information of the House. To-day is unanimous-consent day and also suspension day. It is the purpose of the Chair to recognize the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. STEAGALL] for the purpose of calling up a bill from his committee under suspension of the rules. It has been suggested to the Chair that in order to get time for additional debate on this important measure that the Chair recognize the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. STEAGALL] at 2 o'clock, with the understanding that unanimous consent will be secured at this time, if possible, that there be two hours of debate, one hour on each side. The Chair would like to know the pleasure of the House, so that the Chair may announce whether the House will take the matter up at 3 o'clock or 2 o'clock this afternoon.

Mr. STEAGALL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the House take up the bill referred to for consideration at 2 o'clock, with the understanding that we have two hours of debate, one hour to be controlled by the chairman of the committee and one hour to be controlled by some gentleman who may get control of the time in his own right in opposition to the bill.

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Speaker, I suggest that it might be well that the House be given some information regarding the nature of the legislation, in view of the fact that unanimous consent has been requested.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Nebraska can get further information about that matter. The statement of the Chair was that unless unanimous consent is given for two hours of general debate, the Chair will recognize the gentleman from Alabama, at 3 o'clock, and then there will be only 20 minutes of debate on the side. It is just a question of whether the House wants 20 minutes on the side or 1 hour on the side.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Under the unanimous-consent request, I take it that the bill would be read section by section.

The SPEAKER. No; it would be read under the motion to suspend the rules, and the only difference would be the length of debate.

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Speaker, the Chair did not understand me. What I desired to know was the nature of the legislation which we are proposing to take up at 2 o'clock.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will have to ask the chairman of the committee.

Mr. HOWARD. Then, in the absence of information, I shall have to object.

Mr. BRAND of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, not only the bill but the hearings on the bill have been printed, and are now available for distribution, and the gentleman can get all the information he needs from these documents.

The SPEAKER. The effort of the Chair was simply to procure additional debate, as some gentlemen have asked for more time.

Mr. STEAGALL. Mr. Speaker, I am ready to give any information I can with reference to the bill; but, of course, I do not understand that we should go over the entire legislation under a unanimous-consent request.

Mr. BLANTON. Under the gentleman's request, we would have 2 hours for general debate; and if that request is not granted, we will have only 40 minutes under suspension of the rules. I take it it would be more beneficial to the Members of the House to have 2 hours for general debate rather than just 40 minutes.

Mr. STEAGALL. That is entirely possible. Of course, the matter rests with the House.

Mr. HOWARD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEAGALL. I am pleased to do so.

Mr. HOWARD. I am still without the information which I requested. I want to know, and I think I have a right to know, what the subject matter is that is to be taken up at 2 o'clock.

Mr. STEAGALL. I am glad to give the gentleman the information. It is what is known as the Glass-Steagall bill, with three propositions involved. One is to authorize the Federal reserve banks to make loans where it is considered desirable and prudent; to group the banks upon their joint liability, not less than five being required under the bill to constitute a group.

The second provision of the bill is authority to the Federal reserve banks to make loans to individual banks upon paper that is regarded as satisfactory to the Federal banks and the Federal Reserve Board, but upon security and collateral not eligible for rediscount.

The third provision authorizes the Federal reserve banks to accept direct Government obligations as a basis for currency in place of eligible paper upon which currency is issued under existing law. Any issues under this bill upon Government obligations will be covered, not only by such bonds but 40 per cent of gold in addition. Those are the brief provisions of the bill.

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw my reservation of an objection.

Mr. BLANTON. Still reserving the right to object, I want to ask the gentleman a question. Under the rules of the House and of all other parliamentary bodies, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MCFADDEN], being the ranking member of the committee, who is against the bill, should control the time in opposition. The unanimous-consent request now pending does not guarantee that the gentleman from Pennsylvania will be the one who is recognized to conduct the opposition.

The SPEAKER. Let the Chair state the parliamentary situation. If unanimous consent is given that we have two hours' general debate, the gentleman from Alabama will move to suspend the rules, and the gentleman from Pennsylvania will demand a second and will be entitled to one hour, and the gentleman from Alabama to an hour.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Still reserving the right to object, I would like to ask the gentleman from Alabama a question.

Mr. STEAGALL. Before the gentleman propounds his question, I want to say that I thought it was understood that the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MCFADDEN], the only member of the committee opposed to the bill, would control the time in opposition.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. What I wanted to ask the gentleman is—the gentleman in reply to the question propounded by the gentleman from Nebraska did not state, according to my understanding, that this is the inflation bill that the gentleman is to call up.

Mr. STEAGALL. I did not so state.

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not want to take up the entire afternoon upon this proposition. If anyone wants to object, the Chair wishes he would.

Mr. KVALE. I reserve the right to object so that I may ask the leadership on that side of the aisle if there is any opportunity, even now, to take up this bill under a special rule and consider the bill a little more adequately because of its vast importance and wide scope. Can not this be set aside for a day or two so that we may then take the matter up and consider it more maturely?

Mr. STEAGALL. Mr. Speaker, this is a very short bill. I understand, as does the gentleman, that the measure deals with matters that are technical, but gentlemen who are familiar with the technicalities of banking and banking legislation understand the bill, brief as it is, without extended discussion, just as well as they would understand any other bill of similar kind. Members of the House who are not familiar with legislation of this kind would find themselves in the same difficulty if we had extended debate.

Mr. KVALE. The gentleman surely does not mean to say that this is not an important bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. KELLER. Mr. Speaker, may I ask a question? This is, as it has been said, a bill of tremendous importance. It ought to be thoroughly considered, and even with the liberal proposition of the Speaker it can not be given the consideration that it ought to have in two hours.

Mr. UNDERHILL. Mr. Speaker, I demand the regular order.

Mr. KELLER. Why not take three hours?

Mr. UNDERHILL. Mr. Speaker, I demand the regular order.

The Speaker. The regular order is, Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Alabama? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. Promptly at 2 o'clock the Chair will recognize the gentleman from Alabama to call this bill up. Meanwhile the Clerk will call the Consent Calendar.

HOME AND HOSPITAL FACILITIES TO VETERANS OF THE CONFEDERATE ARMY AND NAVY

The first bill on the Consent Calendar was the bill (H. R. 4577) to extend hospital and home facilities to veterans of the Confederate Army and Navy.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. UNDERHILL. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the right to object. When this matter came up two weeks ago, I asked to have the matter passed over without prejudice. I am in a most embarrassing situation, as my motive in opposing this resolution will be misunderstood and I shall be charged with prejudice. For almost 70 years in a part of our country, impoverished by war, bled white, as it was, the people of that section established a wonderful and enviable record in taking care of their ex-soldiers, the veterans of the Confederate Army, without calling upon the Federal Government or other outside aid. It seems to me it would nullify to a certain degree that wonderful record to ask for assistance either directly or indirectly at this late day to continue for a few years more that splendid record of affection, appreciation, great sacrifice, and service, unsurpassed in the history of the world. I have consulted with a number of men who come from the Southern States, and I have found to my gratification and somewhat to my surprise that they are of the same opinion that I hold with reference to this piece of legislation.

I do not know from what source this proposition emanated. It may be, and I ought not to say so without further proof, that it was instituted by some group seeking assistance in some other kind of legislation to make use of this to obtain support for that legislation. Every Southern State has provided a soldiers' home for Confederate veterans. I have visited many of them. They are comfortable, they are well located, and those who have had the privilege of living in those homes have had nothing but praise for the kindly treatment accorded and the conduct of the officials in charge.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts has expired.

Mr. UNDERHILL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for two minutes more.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Speaker, I shall not object at this time, but this is consent day, and we must proceed under the rule. I shall object to any other request.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. UNDERHILL. I propose to object to the consideration of this bill on behalf of thousands of the citizens of the Southland who would consider it a reflection on their willingness and ability to carry on rather than a benefit to the very few veterans who might be affected by this "gesture," as it is referred to in the report accompanying the resolution.

Mr. HILL of Alabama. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. UNDERHILL. I have only two minutes.

Mr. HILL of Alabama. The gentleman has made a statement, and I think he ought to state who those citizens are of whom he speaks.

Mr. UNDERHILL. I speak for as many as does the gentleman from Alabama.

Mr. HILL of Alabama. Will the gentleman state whom he speaks for?

Mr. UNDERHILL. I had rather not. Mr. Speaker, I object.

MUD RIVER, STATE OF KENTUCKY

The next business on the Consent Calendar was the bill (H. R. 5865) declaring the Mud River in the State of Kentucky, a nonnavigable stream.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. CHAPMAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that this bill may be passed over and retain its place on the calendar.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

CACHE NATIONAL FOREST, IDAHO

The next business on the Consent Calendar was the bill (H. R. 393) authorizing an addition to the Cache National Forest, Idaho.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the right to object. There is a controversy between two departments upon this matter. The Secretary of Agriculture is in favor of the bill and the Department of the Interior is not.

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. Mr. Speaker, that difference of opinion regarding additions to national forests has been pending for 20 years. The Department of Agriculture is agreeable to having this land placed within the national forest so that it can be protected from overgrazing and protection of stream flow, and the people living at the foot of the mountain are anxious to have it placed in the national forest, as the passing of sheep across this uncontrolled area results in tramping down the terrain, which is washed into the irrigating ditches and onto their farms.

Mr. LaGUARDIA. I understand, however, that the Department of Agriculture approves it?

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. Absolutely. The Secretary recommends the legislation.

Mr. LaGUARDIA. What is the basic objection of the Department of the Interior to this kind of bills?

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. For years the Secretary of the Interior has been trying to secure the enactment of legislation to control the grazing lands on the public domain, and Congress has failed to enact such legislation to control such grazing lands because of opposition from some of the stockmen.

Mr. LaGUARDIA. But the entire membership is in accord on this?

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. They are all in accord. The bill was unanimously reported favorably from the Committee on the Public Lands. Since the letter from the Secretary of the Interior in the report opposing this legislation was written I have a copy of a subsequent letter which he wrote to the chairman of the committee, stating that he will interpose no objection to the legislation.

Mr. EATON of Colorado. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. I yield.

Mr. EATON of Colorado. It is understood that this is not establishing a precedent for any addition to any national forest in any State other than the one the gentleman represents?

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. Absolutely not. It is a local proposition and one that is very important to those who live on the farm lands at the foot of the mountain.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that a similar Senate bill (S. 457) be substituted for the House bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Idaho?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the Senate bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That, subject to any valid existing claim or entry, all lands of the United States, within the areas hereinafter described be, and the same are hereby, added to and made parts of the Cache National Forest, to be hereafter administered under the laws and regulations relating to the national forests; and the provisions of the act approved March 20, 1922 (42 Stat. 465), as amended, are hereby extended and made applicable to all other lands within said described areas:

The west half of sections 6, 7, and 18, sections 19, 30, and 31, in township 8 south, range 36 east, Boise meridian; section 6 and the west half of sections 7, 18, 19, and 30, in township 9 south, range 36 east of Boise meridian; sections 1, 2, 11, 12, 13, 14, 23, 24, 25, 26, 35, and 36, in township 8 south, range 35 east, Boise meridian; sections 1, 2, 10, 11, 12, 13, 14, 23, 24, 25, and 26, in township 9 south, range 35 east of Boise meridian, Idaho.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

A similar House bill was laid on the table.

TO AUTHORIZE THE SECRETARY OF THE INTERIOR TO ISSUE PATENTS FOR LANDS HELD UNDER COLOR OF TITLE

The next business on the Consent Calendar was the bill (S. 1583) to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to issue patents for lands held under color of title.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the Senate bill?

Mr. JENKINS. Reserving the right to object, the gentleman from New Mexico and I discussed this matter this morning, and I would like to ask the gentleman if the amendment we talked about will be inserted?

Mr. CHAVEZ. Yes. I am willing that that be inserted.

Mr. STAFFORD. Reserving the right to object, on the last Consent Calendar day I made inquiry as to the reason for this special legislation, special to New Mexico. I understand from conversation with the gentleman from New Mexico that conditions are exceptional in New Mexico that do not prevail in other Western States.

Mr. CHAVEZ. That is correct.

Mr. STAFFORD. There are, in New Mexico, isolated Spanish grants which have been held for a long term of years, on which improvements have been made, and this applies to contiguous lands adjoining those Spanish grants, so that claimants under color of title will not be asked to pay the appraised value, after having been in possession a hundred years or more.

Mr. CHAVEZ. The gentleman has a correct understanding of the situation.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman inform the House as to how large an area this bill will extend to?

Mr. CHAVEZ. It is my understanding and from personal knowledge I would state that it will not affect more than 150 or 160 acres at most.

Mr. STAFFORD. With the statement of the gentleman that conditions are special to New Mexico and do not prevail in other Western States where the appraisal law applies, I shall not interpose objection.

Mr. JENKINS. Will the gentleman kindly read the amendment which he intends to propose?

Mr. CHAVEZ. The proposed amendment which I will submit is as follows:

On page 1, line 5, after the comma following the word "land," insert the following: "contiguous to a Spanish or Mexican land grant."

Mr. JENKINS. That will be satisfactory.

Mr. EATON of Colorado. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the gentleman from New Mexico upon what theory it is required that the people pay the United States Government $1.25 per acre for this land?

Mr. CHAVEZ. Upon the theory that that custom prevailed heretofore under a law similar to this. In 1926 Congress passed a law similar to this, and while citizens were in process of perfecting their titles, Congress passed a general law which the Interior Department said repealed the original law. This is only of local import to our State. I just want to make this brief statement to the gentleman so that he will understand the situation.

Mr. EATON of Colorado. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. CHAVEZ. I yield.

Mr. EATON of Colorado. Would not the gentleman's people be better off and the equities be better served if their title is more than 20 years, running from 60 to 80 or 100 years, clear back into Texas and Old Mexico, if the United States Government gave them a title without charging them $1.25 an acre?

Mr. CHAVEZ. That would be proper, but we do not want that now, because originally it was $1.25 an acre under the 1926 bill, and we are willing to pay $1.25 an acre.

Mr. COLTON. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. CHAVEZ. I yield.

Mr. COLTON. Is it not a fact that in all of these bills a payment of $1.25 an acre is required? The department would not otherwise recommend this legislation?

Mr. CHAVEZ. That is correct. So that the gentleman from Colorado will know exactly what we have in mind by this legislation.

Mr. EATON of Colorado. Will the gentleman yield further for a question?

Mr. CHAVEZ. I yield.

Mr. EATON of Colorado. I have no objection to the bill. I have no objection to the gentleman from New Mexico taking care of the situation so that these people may get a good title where it has been denied on account of technicalities, most of which have been caused by the action of men in the office of the Department of the Interior, but I can not see why the gentleman wants his people to pay again $1.25 an acre. Those people are not homesteaders. Those people have been in possession of the land for 20 years, 40, 60, 80, and 100 years, and the United States Government knew about it all the time, and now they come in to perfect their title. I would like to ask the gentleman if he would not accept an amendment in line 1 on page 2 to strike out the words "upon the payment of $1.25 an acre"?

Mr. CHAVEZ. I feel so much taken up with the merits of this legislation that I hope the gentleman will not submit that amendment. I feel the gentleman is correct. We should have it outright, without any restrictions whatsoever, but the department insists on that and it prevailed on the original bill, and now we have gone into it further and we reserve the mineral rights to the United States. All we want is the title, and we are willing to pay $1.25 per acre.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the Senate bill as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That whenever it shall be shown to the satisfaction of the Secretary of the Interior that a tract or tracts of public land, in the State of New Mexico, not exceeding in the aggregate, 160 acres, has or have been held in good faith and in peaceful, adverse possession by a citizen of the United States, his ancestors or grantors, for more than 20 years under claim or color of title, and that valuable improvements have been placed on such land, or some part thereof has been reduced to cultivation, the Secretary may, in his discretion, upon the payment of $1.25 per acre, cause a patent or patents to issue for such land to any such citizen: Provided, That where the area or areas so held by any such citizen is in excess of 160 acres the secretary may determine what particular subdivisions, not exceeding 160 acres in the aggregate, to any such citizen may be patented hereunder: Provided further, That coal and all other minerals contained therein are hereby reserved to the United States; that said coal and other minerals shall be subject to sale or disposal by the United States under applicable leasing and mineral land laws, and permittees, lessees, or grantees of the United States shall have the right to enter upon said lands for the purpose of prospecting for and mining such deposits: Provided further, That the term "citizen," as used herein, shall be held to include a corporation organized under the laws of the United States or any State or Territory thereof.

Mr. CHAVEZ. Mr. Speaker, I offer an amendment.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New Mexico offers an amendment which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. CHAVEZ: On page 1, line 5, after the comma following the word "land" insert "contiguous to a Spanish or Mexican land grant."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider laid on the table.

IMPROVEMENT OF CHEVY CHASE CIRCLE

The Clerk called the next bill, House Joint Resolution 152, for the improvement of Chevy Chase Circle with a fountain and appropriate landscape treatment.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the right to object.

Mr. GILBERT. Mr. Speaker, the only reason we are insisting upon the passage of this resolution now is that this is quite an attractive approach to the city and the donors would like to begin this improvement so that it will be ready for the bicentennial celebration. It does not cost the Government any money.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. At whose expense is the fountain to be maintained?

Mr. GILBERT. Not at any expense to the Government. The money is to be secured before the work is begun.

Mr. STAFFORD. As I understand, this circle is outside the District of Columbia.

Mr. GILBERT. It is the Chevy Chase Circle; half is within the District and half in the State of Maryland.

Mr. GREENWOOD. The District line runs through the circle.

Mr. STAFFORD. I am interested in knowing who is going to maintain the fountain.

Mr. GILBERT. The District will maintain it. It will be a beautiful fountain, and, as I understand, it will cost about $125 a year to maintain it; one of the small fountains in the District.

Mr. STAFFORD. If the District of Columbia is going to maintain it, I have no objection to the proposed fountain.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I note that the design must be approved by the National Commission of Fine Arts. Of course that suits me, but what I am hesitating about is this: If the gentleman will walk out of this door just a few yards, he will see a bust of Abraham Lincoln, and on that bust are the names of the donors in letters several inches high. It is the cheapest piece of advertising I have ever seen, and I do not like it. It seems to me we should have some assurance that this fountain will not be plastered with the names of the donors who will have their names placed there for the purpose of advertisement.

Mr. GREENWOOD. In view of the fact that the design must be approved by the Fine Arts Commission, would they approve it with names on it?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I hope not. I ran down the authority on this Abraham Lincolun bust. I found the Fine Arts Commission had nothing to do with it, that the Congress had nothing to do with it, and that no one on the Library Committee seemed to know anything about it. I say it is outrageous.

Mr. GREENWOOD. Are not these donations being made by citizens who are interested in having a beautiful community?

Mr. GILBERT. That is true.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Will the gentleman call the attention of the Fine Arts Commission to the point I have raised?

Mr. GILBERT. The bill contains all the safeguards proper in legislation. Some tribunal must pass upon what amount and character of memorial recognition is proper. The legislation can not provide it. The Fine Arts Commission is the proper tribunal and no doubt will adequately protect us from the abuses which the gentleman suggests.

Mr. COLLINS. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I understand that the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. LEWIS], in whose district this fountain will be located, objects to this bill.

Mr. GILBERT. No intimation has been made to us that he has any objection to it. If there is any objection, we have not heard about it.

Mr. COLLINS. I understand that this bill does not meet with the approval of the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. LEWIS], and therefore I suggest that the bill be temporarily passed.

Mr. BLOOM. There was no objection before the committee.

Mr. COLLINS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that this resolution be passed over without prejudice.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

REVISION OF THE BOUNDARY OF THE MOUNT M'KINLEY NATIONAL PARK

The Clerk called the next bill, H. R. 6485, to revise the boundary of the Mount McKinley National Park, in the Territory of Alaska, and for other purposes.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I understand that when this bill was under consideration two weeks ago the Delegate from Alaska, after consent had been granted for its consideration, rose to offer an amendment. I understand that amendment is going to be offered to this bill, and therefore I would like to have the gentleman from Montana acquaint the House with the amendment which the Delegate from Alaska would like to have incorporated in the bill.

Mr. EVANS of Montana. When the matter came up on the last call of the Consent Calendar the Delegate, as suggested, offered an amendment. That amendment came to the Public Lands Committee and the substance of the amendment was approved, but not in the exact language. It was approved, however, to conform to the language in the original bill, and in the absence of the Delegate from Alaska, I desire, on behalf of the committee, to present the amendment in the name of the Delegate from Alaska.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, may we have the amendment read for information, so we may know what is proposed?

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the Clerk will report the amendment for information.

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. EVANS of Montana, for information: At the end of line 15, on page 3, following the word "park," strike out the period, insert a semicolon, and add the following language: "Provided further, That nothing herein contained shall affect any valid existing claim, location, or entry under the land laws of the United States, whether for homestead, mineral, right of way, or any other purpose whatsoever, or shall affect the rights of any such claimant, locator, or entryman to the full use and enjoyment of his land."

Mr. STAFFORD. It was the intention of the framers of the bill not to disturb the rights of those included in the boundaries of the proposed national forest?

Mr. EVANS of Montana. Yes; exactly; and the Department of Agriculture reported that in their judgment the language of the original bill would cover the matter, but to satisfy the Delegate who represents this Territory we have again incorporated the language in this bill.

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the boundary of the Mount McKinley National Park is hereby changed so as to read as follows:

"Beginning at the summit of a hill between the Toklat River and the Clearwater Fork of that river at an approximate latitude of 65° 47′ 45″, longitude 150° 17′ 40″, which is intended to be same point of beginning of the boundary description as contained in the act of February 26, 1917; thence southerly along the summit of the ridge between Toklat River and the Clearwater Fork of said river and across Stony Creek at its confluence with the said Clearwater Fork to the summit of the ridge between Stony Creek and the Clearwater Fork of the Toklat River thence following the summit of said ridge and the summit of the ridge between the tributaries of said Clearwater Fork, the headwaters of the North Fork of Moose Creek and Boundary Creek to the intersection with the present boundary of Mount McKinley National Park at approximate latitude of 63° 32′ 54″, longitude 150° 24′ 45″; thence southwesterly 14.3 miles, more or less, to a point one-half mile north of Wonder Lake on the stream out of Wonder Lake into Moose Creek thence south 68° west 43.5 miles, more or less, to the point of intersection with the southwest boundary extended; thence southwesterly 33 miles, more or less, to the summit of Mount Russell; thence in a northeasterly direction following the present south boundary approximately 88 miles to Windy Creek at approximate latitude 63° 25′ 45″, longitude 149° 1′ 35″; thence easterly following the north bank of Windy Creek to the western boundary of the Alaska Railroad right of way; thence northerly following the west boundary of the Alaska Railroad right of way to a point due east of the present north boundary of the park as extended due east; thence due west following the present north boundary of the park to the summit of the ridge between Toklat River and the Clearwater Fork of said river; thence southerly following the summit of said ridge to the place of beginning."

SEC. 2. That the provisions of the act of August 25, 1916, entitled "An act to establish a national park service, and for other purposes," and the act of February 26, 1917, entitled "An act to establish the Mount McKinley National Park, in the Territory of Alaska," together with all acts supplementary to and amendatory of said acts are made applicable to and extended over the lands hereby added to the park.

With the following committee amendments:

Page 1, line 7, strike out the words "sixty-five" and insert in lieu thereof the words "sixty-three."

Page 2, line 16, after the word "stream" insert the word "flowing."

Page 2, line 20, strike out the word "southwesterly" and insert in lieu thereof the word "southeasterly."

Page 3, line 10, strike out the period and insert a colon, strike out the quotation marks and add the following:

"Provided, however, That such isolated tracts of land lying east of the Alaska Railroad right of way and the west bank of the Nenana River between the north bank of Windy Creek and the north park boundary as extended eastward are also included in said park."

The committee amendments were agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Montana offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk again reported the amendment which had been read for information.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider laid on the table.

ESTATES OF AMERICAN CITIZENS DYING WITHIN CONSULATES

The Clerk called the next bill on the Consent Calendar, H. R. 6310, to amend section 1709 of the Revised Statutes, as amended by the act of March 3, 1911 (36 Stat. 1083), and section 304 of the Budget and Accounting Act, 1921 (42 Stat. 24).

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, may I ask the gentleman from Minnesota if the draft of this bill has been approved by the General Accounting Office?

Mr. MAAS. Yes; I will say to the gentleman from New York. As a matter of fact, the bill was suggested and largely drafted by the Accounting Office.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, under reservation of objection, I think if this bill is going to be considered it will occasion considerable discussion and further amendment. As I am at present advised, I rather think the bill is too important to be taken up on the Consent Calendar.

I merely direct the attention of the gentleman to one amendment that is proposed, which is to section 4, under which amendment you would compel the property belonging to any American citizen who dies in a foreign country, where there were no debts or where the property exceeded the debts required to be paid, to be sent back to the General Accounting Office, and have the General Accounting Office act as a warehouseman for six years.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. That is the law now.

Mr. STAFFORD. No; it is not the law now.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Only it does not go to the General Accounting Office.

Mr. STAFFORD. I think we should consider the matter further; at least I want to give it further consideration.

Mr. MAAS. If the gentleman will yield, the only difference is that instead of having this done by the Treasury Department, under the proposed law it will be done by the General Accounting Office.

Mr. STAFFORD. Let me call the attention of the House to the proposed amendment in this one particular, and I think the gentleman and the House will then agree with me. I am reading from the report on page 3, paragraph 4. I will read now the existing law authorizing our consular officers to sell the property of deceased American citizens where they die abroad:

To sell at auction, after reasonable public notice, such part of the estate as shall be of a perishable nature, and such further part, if any, as shall be necessary for the payment of his debts, and, at the expiration of one year from his decease, the residue.

Now, you are proposing to strike out the words "at the expiration of one year from his decease, the residue," and permit the consul to sell only so much of that property as is necessary to pay the debts "incurred in such country." Then what becomes of that personal property, furniture, and belongings that are not necessary to be sold in order to meet the debts? Under the form of the bill, all that personal property has to be returned to the General Accounting Office and it can not be sold for six years. We make the General Accounting Office a warehouseman.

Mr. MAAS. No; that is not quite correct.

Mr. STAFFORD. I direct attention to my criticism with respect to the fourth amendment.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Why not look at the fifth amendment?

Mr. STAFFORD. I have read the fifth amendment. This is too important a bill to pass now. I have no objection to having it passed over, and I shall be glad to consider it.

Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the bill may be passed over without prejudice.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Will the gentleman reserve his objection so I can explain the bill for a few moments?

Mr. STAFFORD. I have gone over it.

Mr. LINTHICUM. The gentleman has gone over it, but I have not, and I would like to explain the bill to the House.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Wisconsin that the bill be passed over without prejudice?

There was no objection.

CONSTRUCTION OF DAM ACROSS DES LACS LAKE, N. DAK.

The Clerk read the next bill on the Consent Calendar, H. R. 5866, to authorize the construction of a dam across Des Lacs Lake, N. Dak.

Mr. STAFFORD. Reserving the right to object, I wish to inquire why it is necessary for this development association to come to Congress for authority to build a dam entirely local in its nature?

Mr. SINCLAIR. The reason for that is that the lake is listed by the War Department as a navigable lake. That being so, we must have the consent of Congress to make any change.

Mr. STAFFORD. There are hundreds of navigable lakes in the State of Wisconsin, but it is not necessary to come to Congress to get authorization to build a dam to lift the waters of the lake.

Mr. SINCLAIR. Are they all navigable?

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes; actually navigable in fact.

Mr. SINCLAIR. The matter was brought up with the War Department, and the Chief of Engineers and this is their legislation—it is their bill.

Mr. STAFFORD. The War Department, then, is looking for needless trouble when it seeks jurisdiction on a matter that is entirely local.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. It is the policy of the War Department never to relinquish jurisdiction but to take jurisdiction wherever they possibly can.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw my reservation of objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted etc., That the consent of Congress is hereby granted to the Des Lacs Development Association, its successors and assigns, to construct, maintain, repair, and improve a dam across the Des Lacs Lake, N. Dak.: Provided, That work shall not be commenced until the plans therefor have been submitted to and approved by the Chief of Engineers, United States Army, and by the Secretary of War: Provided further, That in approving the plans for said dam such conditions and stipulations may be imposed as the Chief of Engineers and the Secretary of War may deem necessary to protect the present and future interests of the United States: And provided further, That this act shall not be construed to authorize the use of such dam to develop water power or generate hydroelectric energy.

SEC. 2. The authority granted by this act shall cease and be null and void unless the actual construction of the dam hereby authorized is commenced within one year and completed within three years from the date of approval of this act.

SEC. 3. The right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

TO AMEND SECTIONS 22 AND 39, TITLE II, OF THE NATIONAL PROHIBITION ACT

The Clerk read the next bill on the Consent Calendar, H. R. 258, to amend sections 22 and 39, Title II, of the national prohibition act.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Speaker, I ask that this bill go over for a few days.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

REPEAL OF OBSOLETE AND SUPERSEDED SECTIONS IN THE UNITED STATES CODE

The Clerk read the next bill on the Consent Calendar, H. R. 7121, to repeal obsolete statutes and to improve the United States Code.

Mr. STAFFORD. Reserving the right to object, I would like to inquire of the gentleman in charge of the bill whether the gentleman's committee passed on the recommendations of an expert clerk of the committee on the various sections recommended for repeal as being obsolete?

Mr. HARLAN. I will say for the information of the gentleman from Wisconsin that the committee referred all these sections to the Legal Reference Counsel. Then every executive department of the Government was communicated with and information given as to the contemplated repeal, and asking them whether or not they would be affected by it in any way. In every case we got from each department their opinion that they approved of the repeal, or had no opposition to the repeal, as shown in the reply letters here included in the case.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HARLAN. I yield.

Mr. STAFFORD. Take, for example, the first section of the Revised Statutes sought to be repealed. The Secretary of the Treasury, in his letter to the gentleman, states that it is suggested that section 136 of Title II of the code be corrected. But instead you repeal it in toto and leave in force appropriation law that does not carry out the criticism of the Secretary of the Treasury. Here we have a definitive act requiring the Librarian of Congress, embodied in the Revised Statutes as section 89, requiring the Librarian of Congress to give bond of $20,000 for faithful performance of his duties. The bond runs to the Secretary of the Treasury, and in that act there is a provision requiring the deposit of the bond with the Secretary of the Senate. The only criticism the Secretary of the Treasury has is to that part requiring the deposit of the bond with the Secretary of the Senate. But you are repealing it altogether.

Mr. HARLAN. We are repealing the section included in the report.

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes; you are repealing the entire section.

You leave in force the appropriation law that merely covers the same provision, but does not refer to where the bond shall be deposited. You are going further than the Secretary of the Treasury recommends. That is only one instance I would call attention to. I think we should be cautious in repealing these statutes.

Mr. HARLAN. We are not repealing any part of this law that has not been approved by the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. STAFFORD. But the Secretary of the Treasury, in his letter to the distinguished gentleman, said it is suggested that section 136 of Title 2 of the code be corrected accordingly. Instead of that you repeal the entire law, and do not attempt to correct the original section to which he directs attention.

Mr. HARLAN. But we are repealing only section 89.

Mr. STAFFORD. Section 89 embodies not only the provision for the deposit of the bond with the Secretary of the Senate but also the provision that the Librarian of Congress shall give a bond for $20,000 for the faithful performance of his duties to the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. HARLAN. I have here a letter from the Secretary of the Senate also approving this measure. With this act repealed the Librarian of Congress is still required to give a bond.

Mr. STAFFORD. Under what law?

Mr. HARLAN. Under page 546 of volume 29 of the statutes.

Mr. STAFFORD. But that is a provision in an appropriation act.

Mr. HARLAN. He is still required to give a bond.

Mr. STAFFORD. That is a provision in an appropriation act of some years back. The other is definitive law.

Mr. HARLAN. That act has been incorporated in the code.

Mr. STAFFORD. Why is it not better to follow the Secretary of the Treasury and merely provide that that part of section 136 relating to the deposit of the bond with the Secretary of the Senate be repealed?

Mr. GREENWOOD. What is the necessity of having two statutes cover the same thing?

Mr. STAFFORD. One is an appropriation law, not all pervasive, and this is all pervasive.

Mr. GREENWOOD. What the committee is attempting to do is to eliminate a statute here that is unnecessary.

Mr. STAFFORD. In the appropriation act there is nothing that relates to the deposit of the bond. There is nothing in that law that relates to the deposit of the bond.

Mr. HARLAN. But the bond, as a matter of fact, has been deposited with the Secretary of the Treasury ever since 1897. By this act we are simply conforming the law to the practice that has been in existence for a long time.

Mr. STAFFORD. I understand that you are repealing the substantive provision requiring the deposit of a bond with the Secretary of the Senate and leaving then the practice to cover the matter rather than the law.

Mr. HARLAN. The repealing of this act will leave in force and in effect the law that provides that the bond shall be filed with the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. STAFFORD. There is nothing in that appropriation act that requires that. However, if the gentleman is satisfied that the practice will be continued without violence to the law, although I think it is open to criticism, I shall not interpose any objection.

Mr. GREENWOOD. The statute he refers to is still in existence, but provides for the Secretary of the Treasury to approve the bond of the Librarian.

Mr. STAFFORD. That is the appropriation act.

Mr. GREENWOOD. The statute he refers to is a part of the code, and he is trying to eliminate this statute that is not followed.

Mr. STAFFORD. That is substantive law, and the gentleman is trying to keep in the code appropriation law.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I call the attention of the gentleman to the Revised Statute 4334, which would be repealed, which provides that every licensed vessel shall have her name and the port to which she belongs painted on her stern, in the manner prescribed for registered vessels. Why does the gentleman want to repeal that?

Mr. HARLAN. Because it has been reenacted into a later section of the code.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Some of the provisions are obsolete, but this is not.

Mr. HARLAN. The same law is provided in another section. It is provided in Title 46, section 46, of the statute that the name of every documented vessel of the United States, and so forth.

Mr. JENKINS. Reserving the right to object, let me ask the gentleman a question. The distinguished predecessor of the gentleman prepared this codification a few years ago with a great deal of care. At that time he had the assistance of a great many experts, law-book publishers. In the preparation of this amendment, have these experts had an opportunity to pass upon that?

Mr. HARLAN. In the preparation of the code, the actual codification of the law, there were law-book publishers, the Thompson Co. and the West Publishing Co., but this is a little different matter. We used the same staff; we used the same Legislative Reference Counsel; but the publishing house had nothing to do with these repeals, because that is not in their line.

Mr. JENKINS. The only point I want to make clear is that every possible check which the gentleman knows of has been used, as was done originally.

Mr. HARLAN. Absolutely. The fact of the matter is, I will say, that practically everything on this bill was prepared by the former chairman of this committee.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the following obsolete sections of the Revised Statutes are hereby repealed:

Revised Statutes	U. S. Code

With the following committee amendment:

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

PORTRAIT, EX-PRESIDENT COOLIDGE

The next business on the Consent Calendar was the resolution (S. J. Res. 75) authorizing the Joint Committee on the Library to procure an oil portrait of former President Calvin Coolidge.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I want to offer an amendment which I have offered to all of these bills. Some of them have been adopted, others have been laughed at. It is that these paintings should be the work of an artist who is a citizen of the United States. Only in this morning's paper announcement was made of a portrait just finished of the present occupant of the White House, President Hoover, made by Mr. de Laszlo, an English artist, I believe, a resident of London. A great many of the works around this House are works of foreign artists, but when the country was young we did not have our own artists. Now we have our own artists, and I believe we ought to at least give them an opportunity to do work of this kind.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I yield.

Mr. BLANTON. Does not the gentleman from New York think it is quite proper that a painting of President Hoover should be by an English artist? Chinese artists just now are otherwise engaged.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I am talking about art now, not about politics.

Mr. PATTERSON. Reserving the right to object, I wish to say that I am in sympathy with the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York. I also want to say that, if I understand it, this is the regular portrait that has been placed here of all Presidents, and it is not some extra expense.

Mr. GILBERT. That is correct.

Mr. PATTERSON. I shall not object under those conditions, but I think the amendment to be offered by the gentleman from New York should be adopted.

Mr. GILBERT. My understanding is that quite a satisfactory portrait by quite a recognized artist is now in contest. It is by an artist who was elected by the family and is approved by those learned in art. My understanding is he is an American artist, but in order to satisfy the gentleman from New York I will ask unanimous consent, Mr. Speaker, that this bill be passed temporarily, and I will get the information for the gentleman.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Kentucky?

There was no objection.

MANUFACTURE, MAINTENANCE, DISTRIBUTION, AND SUPPLY OF ELECTRIC CURRENT IN CERTAIN PORTIONS OF HAWAII

The Clerk called the next bill on the Consent Calendar, H. R. 307, to approve Act No. 256 of the Session Laws of 1931 of the Territory of Hawaii, entitled "An act to authorize and provide for the manufacture, maintenance, distribution, and supply of electric current for light and power within the districts of North Kona and South Kona, on the island and county of Hawaii, Territory of Hawaii."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, will the gentleman state whether the committee gave any consideration to an opportunity for Government or municipal ownership of this utility plant?

Mr. KVALE. I will say to the gentleman that there is no written record of these hearings. If I recall, the Delegate was asked at the time about that possibility, and the committee was then satisfied that it was not for the moment feasible, and that this development should be made.

Mr. STAFFORD. As I understand the project for which a franchise is granted and for which Congress is asked to approve the Territoial act of the Legislature of Hawaii, it is that there are competing lines there at the present time, under private ownership.

Now, I would like to ask the Delegate from Hawaii whether there is any sentiment in the Territory of Hawaii in favor of Government control and operation of these utility projects?

Mr. HOUSTON of Hawaii. Provision is made in section 8 on page 5 of the report for the recapture of such franchises by the Territory, by the county, or any one of its subsidiaries, if and when it desires to do so.

Mr. STAFFORD. But I am asking whether there is any sentiment in the Territory of Hawaii in favor of Government operation and control of these utility concerns?

Mr. HOUSTON of Hawaii. There is not sufficient capital available for the installation of that, or was not originally.

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman makes a most startling statement that in Hawaii, where there is so much capital flowing in by reason of the preferential market which the Territory has for the sale of sugar, there is no capital available for this purpose.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. But if they have capital flowing in, they would be opposed to Government ownership.

Mr. STAFFORD. I am asking whether there is any sentiment in favor of Government ownership in the Territory of Hawaii?

Mr. HOUSTON of Hawaii. Not any, practically.

Mr. STAFFORD. I understand there is a Public Utilities Commission, whereby the rates are controlled?

Mr. HOUSTON of Hawaii. That is correct.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. That is some consolation, at least.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That Act No. 256 of the session laws of 1931 of the Territory of Hawaii, entitled "An act to authorize and provide for the manufacture, maintenance, distribution, and supply of electric current for light and power within the districts of North Kona and South Kona, on the island and county of Hawaii, Territory of Hawaii," passed by the Legislature of the Territory of Hawaii and approved by the Governor of the Territory of Hawaii on April 29, 1931, is hereby approved: Provided, That the authority in section 16 of said act for the amending or repeal of said act shall not be held to authorize such action by the Legislature of Hawaii except upon approval by Congress in accordance with the organic act: Provided further, That nothing herein shall be construed as an approval by Congress of the theory of establishing value on the actual cost of reproducing or replacing property as contained in section 18 of the said act.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

MEMORIAL IN HONOR OF WILLIAM ROBERT SMITH

The Clerk called the next bill, S. 2286, authorizing the William Robert Smith Memorial Association of El Paso, Tex., to construct a memorial in honor of William Robert Smith, former Member of Congress from the sixteenth district of Texas.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I desire to pay an earnest and well deserved tribute to a former very distinguished citizen of western Texas, who once served in this House, Hon. William R. Smith. I came to Congress from his district, succeeding him from the old sixteenth district of Texas, which was one of the largest districts geographically in the United States. It ran 556 miles east and west from El Paso to Mineral Wells, Tex.; it ran from Lubbock, on the north, 400 miles south to Alpine, and Rock Springs. A part of its territory now forms three Texas districts.

This former Member of Congress, our colleagues will remember, after his tenure here, was appointed a Federal judge and served with distinction in western Texas. He has three very prominent sons who are distinguished and highly respected citizens of Texas. One of his sons, Hon. William R. Smith, jr., is district attorney at Midland, Tex.; another, Hon. Breedlove Smith, is assistant district attorney in El Paso, Tex.; and a third son is a prominent lawyer in a prominent law firm in Fort Worth, Tex. One of his nephews, Hon. Ed R. Smith, is a very distinguished jurist, a member of the court of civil appeals in the San Antonio district of Texas.

Gentlemen, I am glad this bill proposing due honor to Hon. William R. Smith is before the House, and I hope it will pass without a dissenting vote. It pays deserved tribute to a great man and a great Texan. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the William Robert Smith Memorial Association of El Paso, Tex., be, and it is hereby, authorized to construct without cost to the United States a memorial tablet at or near the site of Elephant Butte Dam, New Mexico, in honor of the work of William Robert Smith, former Member of Congress from the sixteenth district of Texas, in behalf of the Elephant Butte project and of irrigation in the Southwest.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider laid on the table.

PRELIMINARY EXAMINATION OF THE EDISTO RIVER

The Clerk called the next bill, H. R. 3951, to provide a preliminary examination of the Edisto River and its branches, South and North Edisto, S. C., with a view to the control of its floods.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, and I am sorry I shall be compelled to object, not because I have any objection to the merits of this bill at all, but because we can not start the policy of having a river and harbor Monday. It seems to me these projects should not be taken up piecemeal, but should be placed on the regular river and harbor calendar.

Mr. COOPER of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman will permit, it was my pleasure to report this bill from the Committee on Flood Control. This is not a river and harbor matter at all, but solely a question of flood control.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Exactly. We are starting with them the same as we do with river and harbor projects. We had a flood control bill up, as the gentleman knows, and we have every session or so. Last year we objected to these bills individually and then they all came in at one time, and that is the proper way to dispose of them.

Mr. SWING. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Yes.

Mr. SWING. I think the gentleman's recollection is at fault. I reported the omnibus bill from the Flood Control Committee last session and it was objected to.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. On the Consent Calendar.

Mr. SWING. It was objected to, and we were told that they desired to have these bills come in on their merit, whereupon the omnibus bill was dropped and the individual items were reported separately.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. The gentleman from California is correct. Our objection, let me point out, is not to the merits but because it is impossible for anyone studying the Consent Calendar to familiarize himself with the details of a bill of this kind, so whether it is individual or omnibus, it should not be on the Consent Calendar.

Mr. COOPER of Tennessee. If the gentleman will yield further, I respectfully submit the gentleman is in error as to the policy. This is the policy that has been pursued and is now being pursued for the consideration of these bills. When one of these bills comes before the Committee on Flood Control, it is submitted to the War Department and a report is sent to the committee relative to the bill. The gentleman will find that report a part of the report I made on this bill, in which there is no objection expressed. This is exactly the way the committee has been handling these matters and proposes to handle them. I was a member of the subcommittee during the last Congress and we gave careful consideration to all these bills, as is the policy of the committee at this session. We held rather extensive hearings on this bill and it was reported favorably by the committee during the last Congress, and again this session.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. The committee will have its Wednesday sooner or later, at which time the committee can take up these matters, and the gentleman will not find me offering any objection.

Mr. COOPER of Tennessee. We did not have a Wednesday during the last Congress, and we have no assurance we will have one during this session. This is a matter that should be given consideration now, in order that this preliminary survey may be made and a report submitted. According to the report from the Secretary of War it is not contemplated that more than $3,000 would be involved in any event. These preliminary surveys have been made right along on these different rivers where the question of flood control is involved. It is our purpose to carry forward the same policy in the consideration of this project. I would like to ask the gentleman to hear from the gentleman from South Carolina, who is the author of the bill.

Mr. FULMER. May I state that this bill was favorably reported by the full committee last year, but it could not be considered because the committee did not have a day during the whole session. We now have a favorable report from the committee and from the department. It is a very important matter because it covers a large area. I want to say to the gentleman that not only will money be saved by reason of controlling floods on this river but a malarial situation that is now costing the Federal Government millions of dollars in the lowlands of the South.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. The gentleman misunderstands my attitude. I am not going into the merits of the bill, but I am saying that such a bill should not be considered on consent day, which is a sort of safety valve for the purpose of getting through noncontroversial bills.

If we establish a policy where flood control and river and harbor projects may be slapped on the calendar, there would be no limit.

Mr. FULMER. Mr. Speaker, may I state to the gentleman that this bill was thoroughly considered, and it is the policy of the committee to vote up or down these bills on their merits. We have a favorable report, with no objection from any source, and unless we can get consideration in this way, perhaps, we may not be able to get the bill considered.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Speaker, for the present, I object.

AGRICULTURAL EXPERIMENT STATION WORK

The Clerk called the next business on the Consent Calendar, House Joint Resolution 194, to correct section 2 of the act of March 4, 1931, to coordinate the agricultural experiment station work, and to extend the benefits of certain acts of Congress to the Territory of Porto Rico.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, the error is as to the year 1931?

Mr. KETCHAM. Nineteen hundred and forty-one.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. It was marked $60,000 in 1931, how does the resolution read now as to 1941?

Mr. JONES. The resolution does not say 1941. It has 1931 for 1941. They ran the years up to 1940 correctly, and then inadvertently put in 1931 instead of 1941.

There being no objection, the Clerk read the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 194), as follows:

Resolved, etc., That section 2 of the act of March 4, 1931 (46 Stat. 1521), be, and the same is hereby, amended by striking out the year "1931" and substituting in lieu thereof "1941," so that so much of said section as is hereby amended shall read as follows: "$60,000 for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1941."

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

WITHDRAWALS OF PUBLIC LANDS UNDER THE RECLAMATION LAW

The Clerk called the next business on the Consent Calendar, H. R. 8087, authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to vacate withdrawals of public lands under the reclamation law, with reservation of rights, ways, and easements.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that this bill go over without prejudice.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Wisconsin?

There was no objection.

AMENDMENT TO RIVERS AND HARBORS ACT

The Clerk called the next business on the Consent Calendar, House Joint Resolution 271, amending section 1 of the act entitled "An act authorizing the construction, repair, and preservation of certain public works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes," approved July 3, 1930, relating to the Mississippi River between the mouth of the Illinois River and Minneapolis.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, this carries $7,500,000, and I am not ready to slip it through in this manner.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I yield.

Mr. STAFFORD. Unless the gentleman from Texas [Mr. MANSFIELD] would like to take the floor——

Mr. MANSFIELD. I yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. STAFFORD. I do not wish be too presumptuous, under the circumstances.

There is an exigent condition that demands the immediate consideration of this bill.

The gentleman from New York is well aware that the Committee on Rivers and Harbors did have its day on Calendar Wednesday a week ago. This bill had just been reported. The day was consumed by the committee in important legislation, and it was the desire of the chairman of the committee to also bring up this bill, but time did not permit.

The gentleman from Texas [Mr. MANSFIELD] did me the courtesy to hand me the decision of the court on the question that makes this remedial legislation so necessary.

As the report sets forth, usually in projects that are authorized for the Chief of Engineers to develop, provision is made "or such modifications thereof as may be found advisable." In the rivers and harbors act of last year, however, so far as this project is concerned the improvement of the upper Mississippi from the mouth of the Ohio up to St. Paul and Minneapolis the law provided that it should be in conformance with the project as reported in the report. In that report the height of the water is limited on project No. 41, some 80 miles south of St. Paul, for the crest of the dam to 663 feet above sea level, whereas it is desired and found essential, to carry out the project as now determined upon by the Chief of Engineers, to raise the water to 670 feet, or 7 feet more.

The Illinois Central Railroad Co. went into the district court for the western district of Wisconsin, presided over by the judge of the eastern district, one of the ablest and most capable judges in the entire country, I may say, Judge Ferdinand A. Geiger, and sought an injunction because the War Department was seeking to build a dam that was not in conformance to the project as authorized.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object——

Mr. STAFFORD. If the gentleman will permit, the Illinois Central Railroad Co. went into the court for an injunction because the original authorization restricted them to raising the height of the dam to 663 point something, whereas the modified report increased it to 670 feet. The judge properly held that as the act only authorized the construction of this improvement and this dam at Alma to a height of 663 feet, the Government had no authority to go beyond that.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I will say to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD] ordinarily the gentleman himself would be the first one to object to the additional authorization of $7,500,000, but in view of the understanding which we had last Wednesday when the matter was up before the House and the convincing and telling statement made by the gentleman from Wisconsin, I shall have no objection.

Mr. JENKINS. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, the gentleman from Wisconsin has not tellingly or in any other way explained the $7,500,000.

Mr. STAFFORD. There is no further expenditure involved in this modified construction, other than that which was originally authorized, but only a change in the project which will require a little higher raising of the dam than was prescribed in the original proposal. The bill does not intend to authorize any greater expenditure for the entire project than was originally carried. It seeks solely to permit the War Department to change the plans as embodied in the original report, if the Chief of Engineers deems such a change advisable.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the House joint resolution, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the provision relating to the Mississippi River between the mouth of the Illinois River and Minneapolis, in section 1 of the act entitled "An act authorizing the construction, repair, and preservation of certain public works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes," approved July 3, 1930, is hereby amended to read as follows:

"Mississippi River between mouth of Illinois River and Minneapolis: The existing project is hereby modified so as to provide a channel depth of 9 feet at low water with widths suitable for long-haul common-carrier service, to be prosecuted in accordance with the plan for a comprehensive project to procure a channel of 9-foot depth, submitted in House Document No. 290, Seventy-first Congress, second session, or such modification thereof as in the discretion of the Chief of Engineers may be advisable; and the sum of $7,500,000, in addition to the amounts authorized under existing projects, is hereby authorized to be appropriated for the prosecution of initial works under the modified project: Provided, That all locks below the Twin City Dam shall be of not less than the Ohio River standard dimensions."

The House joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

TO CLARIFY THE APPLICATION OF THE CONTRACT-LABOR PROVISIONS OF THE IMMIGRATION LAWS TO INSTRUMENTAL MUSICIANS

The Clerk read the next bill on the Consent Calendar, H. R. 8235, to clarify the application of the contract-labor provisions of the immigration laws to instrumental musicians.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Reserving the right to object, as I understand it, this bill, if enacted into law, would prevent any orchestra leader from sending over persons or musicians to play in an orchestra or theater here. This does not apply to soloists or artists.

Mr. STAFFORD. It applies to all.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. The purpose of the bill is to make certain artists or musicians and organizations of musicians who enter the United States under contract shall enter under the provisions of the contract labor laws. The purpose is to protect American musicians from competition brought about by great numbers of alien instrumental musicians who come here under the guise of professional artists exempt from the contract labor law, whereas in fact they are not artists of particular merit in any sense of the word, but are of the most ordinary type and come here for a livelihood.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I do not wish to have my position on this bill construed as being in favor of a later bill similar in character relating to chorus singers.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. The bills, for certain reasons, are not identical in character, and the committee expects to present a third bill relating entirely to alien actors who are now exempt from contract labor law provisions. There will be proper exemptions, of course.

Mr. STAFFORD. We are not going to emulate the position of foreign countries, who exclude American artists.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. No; all high-class and true artists may come, and come under contract, but we are trying to prevent so-called artists from coming to the United States under contract and then remaining after the contract is over to compete with musicians who are domiciled here. We want those who come under contract to go back after their contract is finished.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. It prevents men coming here and playing in an orchestra when there are available American citizens for that purpose.

Mr. JENKINS. The purpose of the bill is to prevent those who come in here under this section from staying and taking advantage of the privilege extended to them.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Yes; that states the purport of the measure. They now come in under a certain exemption from the contract labor law, and then remain after the contract is finished and compete with those now here.

Mr. GREEN. It is to protect our local musicians.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Yes; and will do so, I think.

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the contract labor provisions of the immigration laws shall be applicable to alien instrumental musicians, whether coming for permanent residence or for a temporary period.

SEC. 2. No alien instrumental musician shall, as such, be considered an "artist" or a "professional actor" within the meaning of the fifth proviso of section 3 of the immigration act of 1917 (U. S. C., title 8, sec. 136 (h), second proviso) unless—

(1) He is of distinguished merit and ability as an instrumental musician, or is a member of a musical organization of distinguished merit and is applying for admission as such; and

(2) His professional engagements (or, if the exemption is claimed on account of membership in an organization, the professional engagements of such organization) within the United States are of a character requiring superior talent.

SEC. 3. In the case of an alien instrumental musician coming for a temporary period, who is exempted from the contract labor provisions of the immigration laws by the fifth proviso of section 3 of the immigration act of 1917 as limited by section 2 of this act, his admission to the United States shall be under such conditions as may be by regulations prescribed by the Secretary of Labor (including where deemed necessary the giving of bond with sufficient surety) to insure that at the termination of his contract he will depart from the United States.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

BRIDGE BILLS

The next business on the calendar was the bill H. R. 8163, a bridge bill.

Mr. MILLIGAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the following bridge bills, similar in character, be considered en bloc.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Missouri?

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, may we have the numbers of the bills?

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the numbers of the bills.

The Clerk read as follows:

H. R. 8163, H. R. 8171, H. R. 8238, H. R. 8250, H. R. 8324, H. R. 8327, and S. 2639.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent that these bills reported by the Clerk by number be passed en bloc. Is there objection?

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes out of order on general bridge bill legislation.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I have no objection to these bills. In fact, I commend the States for constructing free highway bridges. However, there is a large number of toll bridges bills that have been offered in the House wherein the right to construct and operate a toll bridge is extended to private individuals. As the House knows, for five years I have repeatedly opposed such legislation, along with the gentleman from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA], the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. SCHAFER], the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. PATTERSON], and others.

I rise at this time to again call attention to the situation in reference to toll bridges. From the northern boundary of Illinois to the southern boundary of that State across the Mississippi River, toll bridges have been constructed. As far as I know, there is not one toll bridge which has been constructed across the Mississippi River from Cairo north that to-day is paying interest on the bonds, unless it be the Cairo bridge, and it has not had time to default. The bonds were sold at par, and now one can purchase all he desires to-day for $5, $10, or $15 at most. On Wednesday of last week in the United States District Court for the Eastern District of Missouri the judge of that court ordered sold at auction a bridge known as the Chain of Rocks-Kings Highway Bridge, just north of the city of St. Louis, where there is an outstanding indebtedness of $1,526,000, representing such a loss to the investors.

In that great little publication known as Labor of last week there is an editorial in reference to the situation in West Virginia. For a bridge which cost $42,000, owned by private individuals, tolls taken in annually amount to $60,000. Just think of that. The State of West Virginia desires to buy that bridge and make it free. Despite the fact that the bridge cost only $42,000, the owners tell the State of West Virginia they will not sell for less than $325,000.

In my State, in the county adjoining my city, St. Louis, there was a highway toll bridge across the Missouri River. The citizens of that county and the adjoining county bought the bridge for $1,250,000 less than five years ago, a hundred per cent or more above the original cost. They improved the bridge, spending a lot of money. Notwithstanding that fact, over and above operating expenses, they have taken in $1,250,000, paid off the bonds, and on the 1st of last January presented the bridge to the State of Missouri, to be forever a free bridge, so that all can now go over that bridge without cost. I maintain that if we can construct roads we can construct bridges across rivers and connect the roads.

My purpose in rising here to-day is to ask that the chairman of the bridge subcommittee, before he reports any private toll bridge bills, hold a hearing on legislation that has been pending before that subcommittee for the last five years, which provides for a general revision of the bridge act so that we can enact legislation that will safeguard the States, the municipalities, and the people who are asked to buy the bonds which make it possible to construct these bridges. [Applause.]

Mr. Speaker, there is a certain responsibility resting upon the Congress in connection with bridge legislation. When you authorize the construction of a bridge by private individuals you are giving away a franchise and you extend to private individuals the right not only to construct a bridge but to issue bonds to finance the construction of the bridge. The bonds are sold to the general public, the constituents of Members of this House. A beautiful picture is painted by the bond salesman of the revenue that will result when the bridge is completed. The people residing in the vicinity of the location of the bridge do not buy the bonds; it is the investor in the large cities that is induced to purchase them. His bond broker, who, of course, receives a commission for selling the bonds, does not seem to investigate, or rather has not investigated, in the past whether it was advisable from a financial standpoint to construct the bridge. He takes it for granted that it is because Congress ordered the bridge constructed.

The fight that has been made upon toll bridges in this House has been well worth the time consumed, because I am happy to say that there are no toll bridges now being constructed by private individuals because the country has been aroused by the debate here; the news has gone forward that professional promoters have cost the citizens of our country millions upon millions of dollars by selling them securities that time has shown were practically not worth the paper they were written upon. The result is that they can no longer sell the bonds. That is the reason they are coming back now and asking for an extension of time. [Applause.]

What is needed is a general revision of the bridge act. Let us change that act so as to give the State the right to have a voice and let the State or States at least have an opportunity to construct a toll bridge, if that be necessary, rather than the private individual. If a bridge is necessary the State or municipality can find a way to finance it. I have said time and again that it took 150 years or more to rid the country of the tollgate on the highways. Why now block the road again with privately owned toll bridges? It is unfair to the people of Missouri and other States that provide free bridges for you and your constituents to be required to pay a toll to pass over bridges in other States.

Again I say to the subcommittee handling bridge bills, let us have hearings on the various bills that have been introduced to revise the general bridge law, and after that has been done and the people's interests properly safeguarded only bridge bills of merit will be presented to the Congress. By so doing you will get rid of the professional toll-bridge promoter and protect the investing public, your constituents and mine. [Applause.]

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for one minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Speaker, along the line of what the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. COCHRAN] has pointed out to the House there are now on the calendar three or four bills for the extension of time, where in the first instance the Bureau of Roads, under the Department of Agriculture, opposed the bill, which was passed by the Congress in some instances, two, three, and four years ago. Now they are asking for another extension to carry on the same promotion on the bridge, and I hope that Members will not take it as a personal matter if some of us in trying to establish a policy object when bills of that character are called on the calendar.

The bridge bills referred to are as follows:
